"For ways that are dark and tricks that are vain" the heathen Chinee is no longer "peculiar." In the presence of the "darker ways and vainer tricks" of these returning boards, the character of the heathen Chinee becomes bright and respectable. They violated the law of their own constitution that required that both parties should be repreown constitution that required that both parties should be represented on the board in Louisiana, but no democrat was allowed on it. There was not the first element of fairness or honesty in constituting these boards. All the machinery for conducting the elections in Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida was in the partisan interest of the republican party. With all the power of those States in their notoriously corrupt and unscrupulous hands; with their partisan supervisors, registrars, judges of election, and poll-holders all working in the interests of their party; with the corrupting aid of Federal patronage and of Federal bayonets; with the aid of money corruptly drawn from the salaries of clerks and other office-holders; with all the office-holders at work, not in the discharge of their legitimate duties for which they were paid by money drawn from the people, but for office-holders at work, not in the discharge of their legitimate duties for which they were paid by money drawn from the people, but for the party, they yet tell us that the elections were not fair; that there was fraud, intimidation, and that though the actual returns showed a majority against them, yet the republicans had a large majority if the election had been fair—15,000 or 20,000 in Louisiana, some say more, and a like a majority in South Carolina. This statement carries falsehood and absurdity on its face, for is it possible that in any free State so large a majority of the people thus sustained by all the power of the State government, exerted legally and illegally to secure a republican result, aided by Federal power and patronage and the bayonet, could have been intimidated by so small a minority as is alleged? No, sir, it is not true; it cannot be true; it is false; it is a slander upon manhood; it is a slander upon the negro; it is a slander upon the carpet-bagger and upon the whole republican party. If they had had a majority, it would have been made to appear.

had had a majority, it would have been made to appear.

But suppose it were true that this large majority did exist? Are gentleman willing to admit that their party can only be sustained in gentleman willing to admit that their party can only be sustained in power by the controlled suffrages of men who have so little spirit, so little regard for the rights of freemen as these men have? Are they willing to admit that their party can only be kept in power in these States by alien, outside force? But by the aid of this outside force the majority is counted out and the minority is counted in and then gentlemen tell us that you cannot go behind these returning boards, that it would be an invasion of the rights of the States to question their acts. Let us look at it for a moment. It is quite certain that if the aid of Federal power were withdrawn from Louisiana and South Carolina Nicholls in the former State and Hampton in the latter and the government represented by them would at once command the quite and cheerful support of the people of those States; this is made manifest by the support given to them; there would be not the slightest danger of bloodshed. On the other hand, Packard and Chamberlain hold their places only by the aid of outside power. All the patronage and power of the Federal Government were invoked to aid them in carrying the election, and when it was found that the free spirit of the rying the election, and when it was found that the free spirit of the people was not broken, that they went to the polls, voted for and elected men of their own choice, then came in these returning boards, with their fraudulent and iniquitous practices, and, for fear that they with their fraudulent and iniquitous practices, and, for fear that they might lack courage, in the face of an outraged people, to consummate the crowning act of infamy, they are not only sustained by troops, but the President of the United States, in a manner never before thought of, acting either on his own motion or on the suggestion of others, invites a committee composed, not of men of both parties chosen for their impartial characters, but of partisans to go down to these States; and for what? In any capacity known to or recognized by the law? No, but professedly to see a fair count! a fair count! that and nothing more!

And now, after having arranged the game in a manner that would make a "heathen Chinee" blush, they gravely tell us that, whether the game has been fairly or unfairly played, we have won; that it would be an invasion of State rights to go behind and inquire into these frauds and outrages and see what was the unbought, the free voice of the people of these States! As if a man were to seize my watch and seek to hold it on the plea of superior force or steal my horse and endeavor to hold him on the plea of insanity. The latter plea might secure him from punishment, but it would be impudent plea might secure him from punishment, but it would be impudent and contemptible as a basis of title. There are no barriers behind which fraud can so intrench itself as to find a legal home, and I was surprised the other day to hear the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garffeld] say: "If the fraud in the State of Oregon has been so committed that we have no power to inquire into it without violating the limitations of the Constitution, then I hope Mr. Tilden will be counted in by fraud and installed," as if the limitations of the Constitution could present a barrier behind which fraud could safely enthrone itself enthrone itself.

But I do not propose to argue the question of power to go behind the action of the returning boards. Whether the power exists or not, one party is, by every principle of estoppel, precluded from denying it. Under the twenty-second joint rule, adopted when the republican party had a majority of two-thirds in each House of Congress, the power to go behind the returns and throw out States was asserted and acted upon by that party in three successive counts of the presidential vote; but now, all of a sudden, they have discovered that it was unconstitutional, and we are told by one of their leaders that a "flood of new light has been thrown upon the subject." It is just the "new light" that changed the lawyer's opinion when he found it was his own, and not the farmer's ox, that was gored. It was "the circumstance that altered the case;" both Houses were then republican and it was safe. One is now democratic; that alters the case. Will not the country lose confidence in and laugh at the pretenses of such advocates of the constitutional rights of the States? It is to be feared that wocates of the constitutional rights of the States? It is to be feared that this new devotion is begotten of loyalty to party, and not to the people, who, in the opinion of our fathers, were the sovereigns in this land, from whom all just power was derived? I wish I had time to discuss this doctrine of sovereignty and loyalty about which we hear so much. I will only now say that they are terms born of monarchies and of despotisms and most frequently used in these latter days by men whose policy would degrade the people to the condition of loyal slaves to the power created and delegated by themselves and to an aristocracy of office-holders instead of masters in a free Government.

office-holders instead of masters in a free Government.

I desire now to show that North Carolina was embraced in the programme for counting in a President. Nothing more is needed than to call attention to the action of Mr. Chandler, chairman of the national republican committee. His telegrams are before the country; but the worst feature was in sending Judson Kilpatrick to confer with the republican authorities in Raleigh. North Carolina had a republican governor, and they expected him to do their bidding; and this man Kilpatrick, who knew how to carry Indiana if he could only get the money to buy "needy independents" and a little more of the "bloody shirt," is chosen and indorsed by the chairman of the national republican committee as the man for this work. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] said the other day:

Louisiana, Florida, and both the Carolinas may be considered in an unsettled condition. Georgia, under a fair, impartial system, would probably be democratic; but I doubt if an unprejudiced man at all competent to pass upon the question, or familiar with the character of the population or the statistics of elections for the past ten years in all the others mentioned, believes that one of them of its own free will would have gone other than republican.

And he asks:

Shall we throw out the votes and reject the representation from Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and South Carolina, and shall we examine the vote of North Carolina?

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I were to say that upon a fair election Kansas would have voted democratic, I doubt not the gentleman from Kansas would think that I had been grossly misinformed or that I had but little regard for the truth. I can inform him in all sincerity that he has been grossly misinformed in regard to the election in North Carolina, and I can assure him that there never was a fairer, a more quiet or peaceable election held in any State in this Union (not even excepting loyal Kansas) than that which was held in North Carolina last November, and though it has been time and again asserted that but November, and though it has been time and again asserted that but for fraud and intimidation that State would have voted republican, I venture to declare that there cannot be found a man in the State who has any character for truth and intelligence to lose who will upon has any character for truth and intelligence to lose who will upon oath say that but for frauds and intimidations that State would have voted republican, and if one should possibly be found whose partisan bias should so far warp his judgment as to so declare, he would find contradiction by the oaths of tens of thousands of the most reliable and truthful men (I will not say "best" men because the gentleman from Kansas does not like the "best blood") of both parties to be found in the State. Now, what is the source of these false impressions which have been fastened upon the mind of the gentleman from Kansas and hundreds of others in the North? Just such false state-Kansas and hundreds of others in the North? Just such false state-ments as are made by such men as this man Kilpatrick, who is in-dorsed by the chairman of the national republican committee who is also a high Cabinet officer, devoting much of his time and labor not to the duties of his office but to the interest of his party, setting an example followed by the tens of thousands of Federal office-holders all over the land. And what does this man, thus indorsed, say and cause to be published in the leading organ of the party, the New York Times, and circulated all over the land † In a letter purporting to have been written from Raleigh, Thursday, November 9, 1876, and published in the New York Times of November 13, he says:

"North Carolina has gone overwhelmingly democratic." I suppose this state ment is almost as familiar to you now as it has become to me within the last two days. I admit that this State is not to be counted as in favor of the republican nominees, but I believe the democratic candidates may not have ultimately the large majority of the votes now claimed for them by their supporters.

* * * What I saw on Tuesday last and what I have heard since horrify me, and I know a recital of the facts must appall every true American citizen. Fraud, treachery, and intimidation are the means by which this State has been carried against the republican party, and these instruments were used by men of resolute wills who are not encumbered by a particle of conscience. The republicans of North Carolina have never been well organized, else I might not now have such a tale of shame to detail.

When they went to the polls on the election day they found those places in the possession of the democracy, who were well armed and determined to resist any endeavor to expel them. Even in thoroughly republican counties was this plan of seizing the polls carried into effect by the democrats. So thorough were their method and organization, the republicans could do nothing. The hypocrisy of the Tildenites was such that it almost surpasses belief, and it is certain that if any violent attempts to dislodge them had been made the apparent blame of causing bloodshed would have fallen upon the republicans. They desired, they said, to have a fair election and would protect every citizen in his right to vote. The republicans accepted their assurances for two reasons: They could not, on the instant, cope with such the roughly organized bands and they did not at first penetrate the hypocrisy of their opponents. Well, the rebels, for such they were in spirit, kept guard over the polls. They admitted voters one by one, and whenever a republican approached the ballot-box they challenged and harrassed him with questions. In this way they consumed time, and in every precinct, as far as heard from, when the sun went down it was found that numbers of the republicans had been challenged and talked out of their votes. As for themselves, the Tilden and Vance men voted early in order to have time to harass their opponents, and the indications are that they also voted early and often.

After further statements of a general character equally untrue he

After further statements of a general character equally untrue he goes on to say:

I have hitherto been writing very generally of the methods of the democrats, but I will now relate a special instance:

Colonel Young, whose home is about forty miles northeast of Raleigh, was a republican candidate for Congress. When he arrived at the polling-place in his town on the morning of Tuesday, (election day,) he found that it was in the hands of the democrats, who had a barricade around it and had stationed a guard to repel any assault. Followed by some friends, he advanced to the entrace of the booth and asked permission to go in and act as a challenger. He was met by five armed men who styled themselves policemen, and who peremptorily refused to allow him to enter as a challenger. He then demanded to be permitted to vote. This permission was granted him; he entered the voting-place, voted, and then refused to leave. After considerable bluster the rebels determined to permit him to remain. He states that every negro that entered the polling-booth was challenged, and time was lost in discussing every case. Republican ballots were snatched from the hands of colored men by the self-constituted policemen, and democratic tickets given to them in exchange, and long before the sun went down the democratic declared the time for closing the polls had arrived. Over one hundred negroes were thus waiting to vote, and if the poll was closed would have been cheated out of their rights. The wrongfulness of the attempt caused a violent discussion, and there might have been bloodshed over the matter were it not for the sudden appearance of the sun, which came from behind a cloud and lighted with his golden rays the raffered and ruinous old room in which the angry dispute was. This overcame the arguments of the democrats, and the voting went on. Yet when the polls did close it was found that twenty-seven negroes had been disfranchised by the persistent challenging of the voters in advance of them, which kept them in line until sundown.

RALEIGH, Thursday, November 9, 1876.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to say that the statements contained in that letter are utterly untrue. He speaks of what he "saw on Tuesday last" (election day) as horrifying him. Why, sir, it is painful to say so, but so is the fact the man was not in North Carolina on that Tuesday. I am reliably informed that he was up North. [Laughter.] But it may be that he had powerful optics and saw down into North Carolina from his home in New Jersey. [Laughter.] Sir, if Dobson & Fogg, attorneys in the celebrated Bardell-Pickwick suit could only have found just one such witness their fortunes would have been made, and that poor, loving, injured woman, Mrs. Bardell, would have had pockets filled with smart-money from the hard-hearted Pickwick's treasury. And what a glorious victory Sergeant Buzfuz would have had! Imagine his triumph, if, instead of poor Sam Weller, he could have just had Kilpatrick as a witness! The "deal-door and flights of stairs" would not have been in his way. O! no; such paltry excuses as Sam found in lack of "wision" would not have stood in the way of justice to injured innocence. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to say that the statements contained in that have stood in the way of justice to injured innocence. [Laughter.]

"Do you tell me, Mr. Weller, that you saw nothing of this fainting on the part of the plaintiff in the arms of the defendant which you have heard described by the witness?"

"Certainly not," replied Sam, "I was in the passage till they called me up, and then the old lady was not there."

"Now, attend, Mr. Weller," said Sergeant Buzfuz, dipping a large pen into the inkstand before him, for the purpose of frightening Sam with a show of taking down his answer. "You were in the passage and yet saw nothing of what was going forward. Have you a pair of eyes, Mr. Weller?"

"Yes, I have a pair of eyes," replied Sam, "and that's just it. If they wos a pair o' patent double million magnifyin' gas microscopes of hextra power p'raps I might be able to see through a flight of stairs and a deal door, but bein' only eyes, you see, my wision's limited."

It has been said that the eagle not only has a strength of wing that enables him to soar among the clouds and bathe his plumage amid the vapors of the thunder's home, but he has an eye that can look with steady gaze the god of day in the face, and, undazzled by the brilliant or he some whomes whence amandas the light the with steady gaze the god of day in the face, and, undazzled by the brilliant orb, can pierce the source whence emanates the light that illumines worlds; but the eye of the eagle is weak and dim compared with that of Kilpatrick's, for he, standing on the low plains of New Jersey, with an eye quickened by suggestions from Mr. Chairman Chandler, and all aglow with patriotic fervor in his party's cause, can look through the dark hills of Pennsylvania, whose rich mines of black coal serve but as crystal lenses to aid his sight as it pierces on through Maryland and through the deep blue menutains of Virginia. through Maryland and through the deep-blue mountains of Virginia away down into North Carolina, where these "optics keen behold what is not to be seen," and the beholder is horrified. [Laughter.] But to be serious, Mr. Speaker, the great dramatist has characterized the man who "steals character" as worse than the man who "steals a purse." What shall be said of those who defame whole States?

In contradiction of the statements contained in Mr. Kilpatrick's letter, I desire to have read the following extracts from a letter of George Badger Harris, esq., indorsed by Mr. Harvil Harris and others. I have only to say that these gentlemen possess high characters and are entirely truthful and reliable, and add that there are only about eleven hundred instead of eighteen hundred voting places in North Carolina, and even eighteen hundred multiplied by ten wouk!, by every honest arithmetic, make only eighteen thousand; but he can make even figures, which, it is said, "do not lie," tributary to his exaggeration:

and even eighteen hundred multiplied by ten woulk, by every honest arithmetic, make only eighteen thousand; but he can make even figures, which, it is said, "do not lie," tributary to his exaggeration:

Young's home is Henderson, Granville County, and then Mr. Kilpatrick says, when the colonel arrived at the polling-place on the morning of the 7th instant, that it was in the hands of democrats, who had built a barricade around it and stationed guards to repel any assaults, &c. It is proper here to state that we never had the honor (!) of a personal acquaintance with Kilpatrick, and would not know him if we were to meet him, but we think we heard nothing in saying that he was not personally present at Henderson on the 7th instant, therefore conclude that he either the honor of the provision of the tributal tributant, therefore conclude that he either the heart of the provisions of letter 24 and title 26 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, purposely avoided taking any active part in that day's proceedings, as any decent man in our position ought to have done, but notified the major of the town that, if his not have done, but notified the major of the town that, if his only we have a supposed and prove so, we would lend our aid. We also informed the Federal inspectors that if they had need we would deputize a marshal to aid them in the discharge of their duties; no call was made upon us by either party during the day and no necessity arose for such interference. "Vewere at the polling place as even o'clock in the morning of the 7th. We found adozen, or perhaps more, planks tacked up in front of a door where the inspectors of election were with the ballothey had voted passed out through a third pass-way provided for the purpose. This plan has been in operation at this precinct for eight years or more, nor could the head had been in operation at this precinct for eight years or more, nor could the head had been in operation at this precinct for eight years or more, nor could the poll-duty and the purpose.

election was wet, dreary, and dark, and late in the evening the impatient crowd got up the cry that the sun was down, but the poll-holders disregarded the false alarm, and the voting continued if anything more rapidly than ever until the sun was fully down, and all the crowd, Colonel Young included, was thoroughly satisfied with that fact.

Patient care and inquiry have failed to discover but three negroes who failed to vote, and these three were hanging about the polls all the day, and had the same chance that their four hundred and sixty-three sable friends had that did vote, which is an answer to the charge that twenty-seven did not vote because of democratic captiousness. Apply the mathematical test: we have from seven o'clock a. m. until sunset, which was fifty-eight minutes after four o'clock, say five o'clock; this gives ten hours in all, or six hundred minutes. There were 776 votes cast at this box, therefore one and one-third votes were cast every minute during the whole day, including meal-times, "rebel" challenges, wrangling, and intimidation, and all other outrages then and there committed. Never was an election held more quietly, fairly, and peacefully, since the foundation of this Government, save the gross fraud perpetrated by a majority of the poll-holders—inclusive of the registrar—as reported above in practically denying the right to challenge infant negres, aliens, and strangers in the township. Nothing save the hellish spirit supposed to be engendered in the fiery bosoms of flends in the infernal world, who gloat in accursed agony in their just, dark, and deep damnation, could ever have prompted Kilpatrick, or any other villain. to pen the foul, lying, slanderous charges contained in the last part of the letter of which we speak, against the character of a long-suffering, law-abiding, peaceable people.

We are sorry to have trespassed on your patience thus long, but truth ought be brought to light occasionally.

Respectfully,

GEORGE BADGER HARRIS.

We, the undersigned, poll-holders who conducted the election at Henderson, Granville County, North Carolina, on the 7th of November, 1876, are willing to testify to the truth of every material fact set forth in the foregoing letter of George Badger Harris, and we further desire to condemn in unmeasured terms the lying, slanderous charges contained in that portion of Kilpatrick's letter referring to the manner in which the election was conducted at Henderson. The foul aspersion sought to be east upon us as men and citizens, who were solemnly sworn to conduct the said election fairly and impartially, cannot pass unchallenged.

HARVIL HARRIS.

HARVIL HARRIS, C. A. NASH. E. G. BRODIE, M. A. BLACKWELL.

As one of the Federal supervisers present at the election held at Henderson, Granville County, on the 7th day of November, 1876, I certify that I was present from seven o'clock a. m. until the last ballot was cast and canvassed, and know that all the material facts set forth in the above letter are true.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, in the brief period allowed me for the discussion of this question, I shall be able to do little more than state my objections to the bill and the reasons why I shall vote against it, without attempting to show the process by which I arrive at my conclusions.

There are occasions arising in the history of every man's life when There are occasions arising in the history of every man's life when he finds duty and inclination antagonizing each other, subjecting him to distressing embarrassment and requiring a determined head to control a faltering heart. Such is my condition to-day. I sympathize with my friends who favor this bill, and would gladly float down the stream with them if I found it consistent with my duty; consistent with the obligation which I took upon myself when I stood in the area in front of the Speaker's desk and with uplifted hand swore to support the Constitution of the United States as long as I should remain a member of this body. I cannot regard this solemn act as a mere idle ceremony. To me it brings the correlative duty of examining the Constitution at all times when questions touching its commands or interdictions shall arise, and of determining for myself whether, with this oath resting upon me, I can vote for a proposed commands or interdictions shall arise, and of determining for myself whether, with this oath resting upon me, I can vote for a proposed measure or whether I am constrained to vote against it.

Mr. Speaker, our Federal Government is one based upon a Constitution of written and defined powers, the provisions of which, once fairly interpreted by a competent tribunal, become the supreme law of the land. In the absence of any such settled interpretation, binding in its effect upon a party called to discharge a duty or exercise a prerogative under the Constitution, such party must interpret it for himself. Among the duties imposed and the powers conferred in that himself. Among the duties imposed and the powers conferred in that instrument is that of counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States. No judicial determination has been had as to the powers and duties of counting this vote. It follows, therefore, that every member of Congress swearing to support the Constitution, in the absence of such binding decision, must in-terpret it for himself. Acting upon this line of thought, my mind has been drawn to the irresistible conclusion that the responsibility of counting and determining this electoral vote devolves upon Congress alone; that in such count each House has a negative power upon the other, and, unless they concur in opinion, no vote objected to can be counted.

This leads me to reject the theory that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, or any number of them, or any other person outside of Congress can be called to arbitrate or settle difficulties growing out of this count, no matter how great the emergency.

Any attempt therefore to devolve the duties appertaining alone to Congress upon any other tribunal is plainly in contravention of both the letter and spirit of the Constitution, of which we are made peculiarly the guardians.

To those who plead in behalf of this measure the emergency which is upon us, the popular clamor in certain sections in its favor, I have but one answer to make, which is: the Constitution possesses no elasticity by which it can be adapted to the passions and prejudices of men, but stands like a rock at sea to repel and break up the waves of popular faction.

From the principles above enunciated I drawthis corollary: that representative is most faithful who is most steady to the requirements of the Constitution.

Following my convictions then as to the constitutional view of this bill I have no choice left me; I must record my vote against it.

But aside from all constitutional difficulties I cannot but regard

But aside from all constitutional difficulties I cannot but regard this bill as both unjust and impolitic, if at all practicable. Unjust because it submits to chance the results of an election already fairly determined by the people at the ballot-box, and which may end in reversing their decision and defeating their expressed will. I have not met one single democrat, North or South, private citizen or public functionary, who has expressed a doubt as to the election of Mr. Tilden upon a fair count; while on the other hand a number of leading republicans concur in this view.

To enter upon this game of chance, then, with republicans, the stake being the presidential office, is about as unreasonable and unprofitable as the result of an illustration which I will give. A man meets me upon the highway, and, seeing that I have a watch upon my profitable as the result of an illustration which I will give. A man meets me upon the highway, and, seeing that I have a watch upon my person, presents a pistol to my breast and demands my watch, claiming it as his own. I remonstrate with him, declaring that he is mistaken, that I bought and paid for the property and have worn it for twenty years. He pays no attention to my affirmation or remonstrances, but gravely tells me, "You see, sir, a terrible emergency has arisen, a fearful crisis is upon us, and now you are to surrender this watch or submit to an only alternative, which is, to play with me at cards a game for this stake. If you beat me, you can retain the watch; if, on the other hand, I win the game, the watch is mine." What would be the public judgment of a man who would stultify himself by becoming a party to such a transaction? Such a course would excite no feelings in the hearts of his best friends but those of mirth and ridicule. Better far allow the open robbery to be committed, with the chance of making the robber amenable to the law in after-with the chance of making the robber amenable to the law in aftertimes than involve one's self in so disgraceful a transaction.

I need hardly stop to make an application of this illustration. Before the election came off the game of bullying commenced by sending troops to the Southern States to overawe and intimidate the democratic party. Failing in this, corrupt returning boards were manipulated; the votes of counties were suppressed or thrown out; judicial decisions were disregarded and overridden; rules heretofore observed for counting the electoral votes were declared abrogated; the power to count said votes was claimed for the President of the Senate, to the exclusion of Congress; and, to consummate the treasonable plot to count in as President a man never elected, troops have been amassed in this city, constructively in the Capitol building, to intimiamassed in this city, constructively in the Capitol building, to intimidate the people's representatives and force from them the recognition of what they call rights, but which are in fact but the baldest assumptions. All things being in readiness, their plans having fully matured, they confront us boldly, and declare that a great emergency has arisen, an awful crisis is upon us, and threaten that, unless this high joint commission is established, before which they can be allowed to play for the presidential stake, they will blow the country and Constitution to atoms by the forcible inauguration of their candidates. didates.

For myself I will have none of it. Though I should stand solitary and alone in opposition to this bill, I shall not thereby be deterred from following my convictions of duty. There is not now, there from following my convictions of duty. There is not now, there never has been any danger of an armed conflict growing out of this question. Nobody desired it, nobody intended it. All that was necessary from the beginning, to secure the fruits of a democratic victory honestly achieved, was to get clear of timid and temporizing leaders, and allow the honest, constitution-loving masses to speak out in primary meetings, in their own honest way. But they have been kept back, and only the money-changers have been allowed to come to the front. Wise men have seen for weeks past that all this cry about war and bloodshed was as empty and harmless as stage thunder. about war and bloodshed was as empty and harmless as stage thunder, about war and bloodshed was as empty and harmless as stage thunder, vox, et praterea nihil. But it was a part of the play, and has served its purpose. No, Mr. Speaker, it was not the sword of Brennus that was to decide this issue, but the money-bags of capitalists.

I would not be understood as in the remotest degree charging those who are fortunate enough to have money using it improperly to secure the passage of this bill, much less would I charge any member of this body with corrupt motives in voting for it. But what I mean to say is that capital, always timid, shrinks from any disturbance of the channels of trade, any abnormal political condition likely to paralyze money-letting and money-getting and derange business relations. And hence the influence of that class, which is potential, has been brought to bear, through resolutions and petitions, in commercial circles and associations and boards of trade, to influence the passage of this bill. I greatly fear that in their anxiety for present peace, which I have never felt was likely to be disturbed, they have broken down the middle wall of partition which alone could separate them from agrarianism and secure to them the enjoyment of their honest earnings. A deep and wide-spread dissatisfaction pervades the public mind arising from the conviction that this Government for the last fifteen years has been run in the interest of capital as against labor. Such teen years has been run in the interest of capital as against labor. Such a state of feeling on the part of the masses is not to be trifled with or even disregarded. History teaches some instructive lessons upon this point which it might be well to heed before pressing matters

But, Mr. Speaker, I find that I have wandered from the point which I intended to make, namely, that by relegating the power of Congress to count the electoral vote to the commission provided for in this bill, we submit the whole matter to chance.

I know this statement has been contradicted; but as practical men, who have a great duty to perform, brushing away the cobwebs of sophistry, dispensing with all verbal criticisms, paltering with facts in no double sense, let us examine this subject as it honestly and truthfully presents itself. The following is the section of the bill which provides for raising the joint commission:

During the session of each House on the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, 1877, each House shall, by viva voce vote, appoint five of its members, who, with the five associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be ascertained as hereinafter provided, shall constitute a commission for the decision of all questions upon or in respect of such double returns named in this section.

From the language of this section it will be seen that the House is to elect, viva voce, five of its members to act as a part of this commission. The House is largely democratic, and has the power to elect such members as will reflect its views faithfully and unalterably. No democrat will be called to serve upon it who has not fully and unchangeably committed himself to the view that Tilden and Hendricks were elected.

The Senate, being largely republican, will of course select its members with the same views and purposes as did the House, mutatis mutandis. Should the two Houses by common courtesy consent to place upon the list of referees two republicans in the House and two demoupon the list of referees two republicans in the House and two democrats in the Senate, the complexion of the commission will not be changed. The republicans in the House and democrats in the Senate will of course be allowed to designate the members from their respective parties, who are to be chosen. Here then, to begin with, you have five democrats and five republicans, all firmly fixed in their opinions, openly expressed, publicly avowed, and who dare not betray their trust lest the finger of scorn should follow them through life.

The bill then provides further that-

On the Tuesday next preceding the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877, or as soon thereafter as may be, the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United State now assigned to the first, third, eighth, and ninth circuits shall select, in such manner as a majority of them shall deem fit, another of the associate justices of said court, which five persons shall be members of said commission; and the person longest in commission of said five justices shall be the president of said commission.

From this section it will be seen that the judges from the first, third, eighth, and ninth circuits are specially designated as members of this commission. Why should they be specially named? Are they "learned commission. Why should they be specially named? Are they "learned above their fellows?" Why not take the circuits in their numerical order, one, two, three, four? Let not the country be hoodwinked as to the reasons for their selection. Good men all and able judges; but still the question remains unanswered, Why were they selected? This is the answer, and the only one given: Two of them are known to be democrats, in full fellowship with the party, and two are avowed republicans, in high favor with that party, and one of them at least—Judge Miller—has been interviewed by a reporter. He has published and has openly declared his opinion that Hayes was duly and legally elected and should be inaugurated.

why go to the Supreme Court for members of this commission, unless it be to give dignity to this compromise; unless it be to gild this bitter pill which is offered to the country? Is it to be expected that bitter pill which is offered to the country? Is it to be expected that there will be found anything more than men in these judges, with prejudices and predilections like other men? It has never been demonstrated in my own experience, nor have I read in history, that putting a clerical robe on a man and placing him in the pulpit, or putting a powdered wig and gown upon a judge and seating him on the bench would relieve him from all the dross of human nature that was born in him, and lift him to an eminence where he would be beyond the passions, frailties, and assailments common to humanity. passions, traities, and assailments common to humanity. He who looks for perfection in his fellow-man, it matters not how exalted his station, but deceives himself and wrongs his brother. I honor the men who fill these stations, but only as men. These judges, like the members of the Senate and House, were chosen because of their known political opinions and party affiliations. They would not have been chosen unless these had been known. Now you have fourteen members of this grand commission, seven on each side, standing like two provides in bettle array each prevailed in party and it has been all dead and all the array each prevailed in party and it has the standard and the series of the series and the series of the series and the series are series as a series of the series and the series are series as a series of the series and the series are series as a series of the series and the series are series as a series of the series are series as a series are series as a series of the series are series as a series a bers of this grand commission, seven on each side, standing like two armies in battle array, each panoplied in party mail, steel-clad and copper-bottomed. Will the tourney now begin? Shall we witness the shivering of lances, and see any or all of the combatants rolling in the dust? Not so fast, if you please. These Daniels come to judgment under this bill have a little side play of their own first to be attended to. They are to retire to some unknown place, at some unknown hour, and in some unknown way select some unknown man whose unknown opinions are to decide this great presidential contest and, it may be, pronounce indement setting aside the popular verses and it may be, pronounce indement setting aside the popular verses and. test and, it may be, pronounce judgment setting aside the popular verdict. Who can contemplate such an innovation upon the Constitution and every established precedent without sorrow of heart and terrible misgivings as to the future. To one man, for it comes to this at last, is delegated the powers and duties so clearly conferred and imposed by the Constitution upon the whole Congress. Listen to its solemn words:

The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

There is no uncertain sound coming up from this clause of the Constitution. Tell me, if you can, where there is any room under the provisions of this clause to form a partnership with the judges of the Supreme Court, however honest or dignified, or with any one else outside of the Congress, for counting and determining the electoral vote? The President of the Senate shall open the votes and the votes shall be counted in the presence of the Senate and House, or, as it has always been construed, by the Senate and House, the person having the highest number of votes, if a majority of all the electors appointed, shall be the President; if there be a failure to elect in this joint convention, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

Again I ask, how do we get these judges into this constitutional court, itself higher than the Supreme Court, established for determining a great political result ?

It is most clearly a gross interpolation upon that instrument to induct them into any such office. It is known to all readers of the debates and proceedings had in the convention which framed the Constitution what anxious care our fathers manifested to separate as far stitution what anxious care our fathers manifested to separate as far as possible the three departments of our Government, legislative, executive, and judicial, from each other. Could they have placed an impassable gulf between them, could they have stationed an angel with a flaming sword at the portals of each, to guard it against the approaches of the others, I doubt not they would have done so. The safety and perpetuity of the Government was often declared to depend upon the steady movement of each department in its own proper, prescribed orbit. It was then predicted, and has often been declared since by patriots and statesmen, that whenever one of these departments began to trench upon the rights and privileges of the others, or either of them, our Government would then have entered upon a down grade dangerous to its perpetuity and the rights of its citizens.

down grade dangerous to its perpetuity and the rights of its citizens.

In this bill there is a surrender of the powers and privileges of Congress to this extra-constitutional tribunal, the consequences of which no man can foretell.

It may be said, and has been said, that Congress has reserved to itself the power of revising the decisions of this commission. There is only one contingency in which Congress can ever get control of the subject once it has been handed over to this commission, and that is "non objection made in writing by at location of the subject once it has been handed over to this commission, and that is subject once it has been handed over to this commission, and that is "upon objection made in writing, by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order shall govern." Let us treat this clause with fairness, and examine it in the light of past experience and present surroundings, and see if this pretended reservation of power is not far more apparant they real. The decisions of this commission as long as they are and see if this pretended reservation of power is not far more apparent than real. The decisions of this commission, as long as they settle no fact or principle adverse to either party, but indifferent in their bearing upon the result, will of course go unquestioned; but as soon as any point is decided giving advantage to either side, and a reversal of that decision is sought to be made, the party gaining the advantage will never consent to surrender it. To illustrate: Suppose a majority, or in the event of a tie vote, which is much more probable, the fifth judge shall decide that the commission cannot go behind the certificate of the returning board of Louisiana, does anybody suppose the republican Senate would consent to surrender this advantage and reverse the decision thus made? Suppose, on the other hand, it shall be decided that the vote of Florida must be counted for Tilden, does any man of sane mind imagine that the House will consent to reverse any man of sane mind imagine that the House will consent to reverse this decision? No, Mr. Speaker, this clause was only put into the bill to preserve a semblance of control on the part of Congress over a subject of which the Constitution gives it exclusive jurisdiction, and which jurisdiction cannot be transferred to other shoulders. This say-which jurisdiction cannot be transferred to other shoulders. This saving clause is a delusion and a snare. Duty and obligation are the correlatives of power and privilege, and as the latter cannot be delegated or transferred, so the former cannot be shunned or avoided.

But I declare my belief also that the bill is impolitic. Impolitic, because it brings down from the lofty eminence given them by the Constitution judges upon whose impartiality in judicial decisions and fidelity to truth and honor depend the life, liberty, and property of the citizen, to mingle in party politics, soil the judicial crmine, and subject themselves and whatever decision they make in this case to merited or unmerited censure, and it may be to unstinted abuse, thereby cheapening them in public estimation. Had the committee reporting this bill proposed to eliminate all purely legal questions growing out of this controversy from the facts of the case and submit them to the United States Supreme Court for opinions, to be certified to Congress for its guidance, I suppose it would have met with mit them to the United States Supreme Court for opinions, to be certified to Congress for its guidance, I suppose it would have met with no objection. But when the whole case embracing facts as well as law is to be submitted to these judges as to a nisi prins jury, to be by them decided, I think it is detracting from their dignity, lessening their influence, and it may end in destroying their usefulness. Time and again has it been affirmed in their decisions that they could take no again and the conditions of the conditions that these belonged to another tri again has it been affirmed in their decisions that they could take no cognizance of political questions, that these belonged to another tribunal and must be determined in another forum. Yet Congress is seeking by this bill to force such an issue upon the judges of that court. I shall pursue this thought no farther.

But, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to detain the House a few minutes longer upon another point. Much speculation and argument has been indulged in as to the relative powers and duties of the President of the Senate in the count of the electoral vote.

In order to the better understanding of this subject, it may be well to refer to the Constitution as to his general powers, and ascertain if they are so extraordinary as to favor the idea that he may assume others not granted expressly or impliedly in the Constitution, article 1, section 3: "The Vice-President of the United States shall be the President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided." This is the first mention made of him or his duties. Again he is mentioned in article 2, section 1, as follows:

In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death-resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President.

From these general powers it will be seen that his functions are exceedingly limited. He is to preside over the Senate, simply enforcing the Senate's rules, with mouth as silent as a sepulcher, unless in cases of a tie vote, when the seal of silence is broken and he may cast the deciding vote. Here his powers end under this clause, and again the seal of silence is placed upon his lips. Under the latter clause he is to act as President in the contingency of the death, resignation, or is to act as President in the contingency of the death, resignation, or inability of the President to discharge the powers and duties of his office. How meager, then, are his powers. He cannot make a rule for the government of the Senate, he cannot raise a committee, he cannot appoint a page, or even the menial that sweeps the floor of the Senate Chamber, without the consent of that body. We see him there in the Senate as a sort of locum tenens, grave, dignified, proper; speaking only by the permission of the Senate through its rules, except in the contingency of a tie vote, as above stated, which rarely occurs. In the other case, as successor to the President, he occupies the position of heir expectant to the throne, a sort of contingent-remainder. In the other case, as successor to the President, he occupies the position of heir expectant to the throne, a sort of contingent-remainder man, who can do nothing more than draw his salary and wait for the President to die or be impeached. His absolute inherent powers are not equal to those of the bailiff, who waits on a justice's court. Yet it had been claimed by certain latter-day statesmen, because he is required "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" to open all the certificates of the aleatent particular to the presentative of the country of t quired "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" to open all the certificates of the electoral votes which are cast for President and Vice-President, that he is to determine their validity, and all other questions growing out of the count, without the advice, consent, or concurrence of either Senate or House of Representatives. A more complete non sequitur I have rarely known to follow from premises so badly taken and persistently held. The sole office of the President of the Senate in this joint convention is to break the scale of the envelopes containing the certificates of the electoral seals of the envelopes containing the certificates of the electoral votes, pass them to the tellers appointed by the Senate and House of Representatives, who are their functionaries and authorized by them to read these several certificates in their hearing, to be approved or disapproved by the said Senate and House, and when finally disposed of, to sum up the result, which the President of the Senate, pro forma, announces to the joint convention just as he announces the result of a vote taken in the Senate after it is passed up to him by the Secretary of that body.

By what stretch of imagination can it be asserted that this man of such limited general powers under the Constitution when he comes to meet this joint convention expands into such huge proportions as to draw to himself all the duties and prerogatives of the two Houses and leave them idle spectators of the grand pageant which he exhibits to their astonished view? One-man power has been the dread hibits to their astonished view? One-man power has been the dread and terror of our people for a hundred years. Men have spoken and written against it in language of animated rhetoric and vehement denunciation, but here it presents itself in all its deformity and wickedness. It is a deliberate attempt, unmitigated by decency, unsupported by precedent, to force a rejected candidate upon an unwilling people. To do this it was found necessary to abrogate the joint twenty-second rule of the two Houses, which had been enacted by the republican party while having an overwhelming majority in both Houses, and under which three republican Presidents had been installed. This rule recognized the power of the two Houses to count and determine the most of the second residents in the second residents.

Houses, and under which three republican Presidents had been installed. This rule recognized the power of the two Houses to count and determine the vote without the intervention in the slightest way of the President of the Senate. It further recognized the power of either House to object to the counting of any vote, and if that objection were persisted in the vote could not be counted, and so was lost. It is not claimed that the rule added anything to the Constitution or the powers of Congress acting under it, as it could certainly detract nothing from either. But it was looked upon at the time of its adoption as a fair exposition of the clause relating to the count of the electoral vote, and has been lived up to and practiced upon until the republican party found itself beaten in the late election and all hope out off of inangurating a candidate repudicated by a popular majority cut off of inaugurating a candidate repudiated by a popular majority cut off of inaugurating a candidate repudiated by a popular majority of more than a quarter of a million of votes.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say if there ever was any necessity for or propriety in passing this bill, that occasion passed away when the Senate, by a vote of 47 to 17, declared against the power of the President of the Senate to count the electoral vote, thereby affirming that this power rested in Congress. From that moment all chance of counting in a republican President vanished. Look at it in any view of the case and this declaration will be found to be true. Should it be claimed that the joint or concurrent action of the two Houses is necessary to count the electoral vote of a State, then two Houses is necessary to count the electoral vote of a State, then the Louisiana and Florida votes could not be counted for Hayes, as this House would never consent to it, and so he could not get the requisite 185 votes. On the other hand, should it be determined requisite 185 votes. On the other hand, should it be determined according to former precedents and the twenty-second joint rule, that each House must judge for itself and holds the power to negative the actions of the other, then the votes of these States could not be counted for Hayes, for the reason that it is believed by a large majority of this House that the certificates were fraudulently obtained and bear upon their faces anything else than verity and the honest reflex of the popular sentiment of these States.

In neither event, therefore, could the republican candidate be declared elected. It may be said, and truthfully too, that the Senate will have the same power as the House in this joint convention, and may prevent the election of Governor Tilden as the House may the election of Governor Hayes. Admit this to be true, and still all the advantages are on the side of the House.

This disagreement could only result in a failure to declare either candidate elected by the count, in which event the duty devolves upon the House to elect immediately, by ballot, a President, leaving the Senate to elect a Vice-President.

I do not believe the supporters of this bill can escape the force of this reasoning by showing that it is fallacious or unsound. If this be the true aspect of the case, then why establish this commission with such plenary powers in one man, the fifth judge, and submit this whole matter to chance, when a way of escape from this labyrinth in which our unscrupulous enemies have involved us is open to us, clear, smooth, and free from constitutional objections? It can afford clear, smooth, and free from constitutional objections? It can afford no more easy and certain solution of the case; it may complicate it still further and end in disaster. A distinguished republican member of this House declared in my hearing that the vote in the Senate upon this bill virtually counted Governor Hayes out of the Presidency, as it settled the question against the right of the President of the Senate to count and determine the electoral vote, but if the bill should pass this House it greatly increased his chances. So I have thought and so I have argued. We lost our first chance for want of proper and timely action. Shall we lose our second by hasty and injudicious action? If so, our blunders will be far worse than crimes, and to an injured constituency we will be called to make our plea for mercy and forgiveness. and forgivene

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allowed under the rule adopted by the House, I shall only be able to advert to some of the leading points involved in the discussion of the bill now before us for leading points involved in the discussion of the bill now before us for consideration. I would very gladly fall in with what seems to be the current of public sentiment upon this question, with the view of satisfying the mind of an anxious and distracted public, by giving my support to this measure, if I could find any warrant for it in the Constitution of the country. All my feelings and impulses would lead me naturally in that direction, but, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill because, in the view I take of it, it proposes not only to set aside and disregard the clear injunction of the Constitution, and the usage under it for lifty years after its adoption, but to substitute a tribunal un-known to the Constitution, clothed with power to decide a presidential contest and to decide it upon other and different evidence and papers from those named in the Constitution as the basis of action in counting the electoral votes.

Now, sir, if it be true that this bill involves these consequences, no member of this House, whatever may be the great public necessity which seems to surround us, should be induced to give it his support. The Constitution, sir, after providing for the choice of electors in the several States of the Union, and that they shall, on a day to be designated by a law of Congress, cast their vote for President and Vice-President, and send a certified list of such votes under seal to the President of the Senate, at the seat of Government, then directs that "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted." then be counted."

As adopted by the convention which framed the Constitution, as shown by the record of its proceedings, this clause would have read

The President of the Senate shall in that House open all the certificates, and the votes shall be then and there counted, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The transposition of certain words and the omission of others in the Constitution as finally completed and submitted to the States for their adoption was undoubtedly the work of a committee on revision, or, as it is sometimes called, a committee upon style, and was not intended to change in any degree the effect of the Constitution as it had been adopted by the convention.

Here are apt words to describe the Senate and House of Representatives as witnesses of an act to be performed by someone else. Not that they are to be entirely disinterested spectators; no one will claim that. They are to be present at the count of the electoral vote by the presiding officer of the Senate, as the electors are or may be present at the original canvass of the votes, so as to see that the count is conducted in a legal and regular manner, that mistakes by inadvertence do not occur, but with no right to participate in, or in any manner control the action of the presiding officer of the Senate in making the count. The language of the Constitution will admit of no other interpretation.

There are many cases where solemn instruments, such as convey-ances of real estate and last wills and testaments, are required to be executed in the presence of at least two subscribing witnesses.

These witnesses are made such in order to be able to certify that the instrument was in fact executed as the law provides, but they are in no sense actors.

So in the case under consideration the act of opening the certificates and counting the votes are acts to be performed in the presence of the two Houses of Congress. The only person named as an actor is the presiding officer of the Senate. And those named as the specis the presiding officer of the Senate. And those named as the spectators or witnesses are the two Houses of Congress. How puerile and trifling a constitutional injunction to open the certificates would appear if all power in the presiding officer is to then cease. Such being the fair and only reasonable interpretation of the language, it is important to see how it was practically interpreted by the framers of the Constitution and their contemporaries.

The convention which framed the Constitution adopted two resolutions and the constitution adopted two resolutions.

tions on the 17th day of September, 1787, one of which I will read:

Resolved. That it is the opinion of this convention that, as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution, the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this Constitution; that after such publication, the electors should be appointed, and the Senators and Representatives elected; that the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes, certified, signed, sealed, and directed, as the Constitution requires, to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned.

Now come the important words:

That the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate, for the sole purposs of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President; and that, after he shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should, without delay, proceed to execute this Constitution.

These resolutions thus adopted by the convention were transmitted by it to the then Congress of the United States, certified by George Washington as president of the convention and by William Jackson washington as president of the convention and by william Jackson as the secretary of the convention.

On the 28th of September, the same month, the Congress of the Confederation by a resolution re-adopted these resolutions, and directed that they with the Constitution should be sent to the States for ratification. Along with the Constitution they sent this resolution providing the practical mode in which proceedings under the Constitution should be commenced.

In the mean time the Congress of the Confederation adopted a resolution fixing the first Wednesday of January, 1789, as the day for the States to appoint their electors, the first Wednesday of February as the day for the electors to assemble in their respective States and cast their votes, and the first Wednesday in March as the day for commencing the proceedings under the Constitution. In this way the 4th day of March, 1789, was named as the commencement of the first presidential term. On that day Congress assembled, but no quorum being dential term. On that day Congress assembled, but no quorum being present in either House, adjournments were made from day to day until the 6th day of April, 1789, when, a quorum of both Houses having assembled, the Senate, in pursuance of said resolution, chose by ballot a President for the "sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States," (so the record states,) and the choice fell upon John Langdon. No one can read the proceedings of that day without observing how scrupulously the instructions of the convention in the resolution it adopted, which was sanctioned by the Congress of the Confederation, were followed. It is true the Senate chose gress of the Confederation, were followed. It is true the Senate chose a teller and requested the House to choose one or more of its members to sit at the Clerk's table and make a list of the votes as they should Declared by whom? By the President of the Senate selected for that purpose.

When the two Houses assembled in the Senate Chamber, Mr. Laugdon, the President selected for that purpose, declared, so the record

The Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States—

Giving the list made by the tellerswhereby it appeared that George Washington was elected President, &c.

The House resolved to attend in the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate, which was to the effect that the Senate had chosen a President for the sole purpose of openthat the Senate had chosen a President for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States, had selected one of its members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they should be declared, submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of its members for a like purpose. The record also states that two members of the House were selected to make such lists, and the persons so chosen, after the House returned to its Chamber, "delivered in at the Clerk's table a list of the votes of the electors of the several States, for President and Vice-President of the United States, as the same were declared by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and of this House," &c., which was entered on the Journal. The House then sent by James Madison a message to the Senate, that a notice of the election should be given in such manner as the Senate should direct; and the Senate adopted a certificate, which is recorded at length in the Journal of the Senate, and is in the following words:

Be it known that, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States

Be it known that, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America being convened in the city and State of New York the 5th day of April, A. D. 1789, the underwritten, appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice-President; by which it appears that George Washington, esq., was unanimously elected, agreeably to the Constitution, to the office of President of the United States of America.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal.

JOHN LANGDON.

It has been claimed that this was only a temporary arrangement. I do not so regard it. True, the selection of the officer was temporary, until a Vice-President should be declared elected, but the duties he was to perform were of a nature as enduring as the Constitution, and a type of those which the incumbent of the same office should discharge at each recurring presidential election.

I have thus, more in detail than may have been necessary, adverted to the proceedings in the first count of the electoral votes. They furnish to us the practical interpretation placed upon the Constitution by those who framed and adopted it.

Such interpretation is much more reliable than the commentaries of Story or Kent, even if they differed as they do not, or the action of the two Houses in adopting, in a most extraordinary emergency, the twenty-second joint rule. To my mind they furnish a most satisfactory test of the true construction to be given to the clause of the Constitution relative to the count of the electoral votes. Whether it has been followed on all occasions since is not important. That efforts have been made by the Congress from time to time to assert and obtain control over disputed questions growing out of the electoral vote is undeniable. So far such efforts have not been successful. It is fortunate perhaps for the country that they have failed. It is, if possible, more important to adhere to the constitutional mode when the majority in the electoral college is small, than when it is large or unanimous for one candidate as in 1789.

To my mind it is a monstrous proposition for the two Houses of Congress when there is a majority of only one in the electoral vote, as at present or for either House to assert the right to reverse that majority or declare a different result, or to decide or declare that there has been no election and take the choice of President and Vice-Presihas been no election and take the choice of President and Vice-President into their own hands. When we remember there is no warrant found in the Constitution for such action, it is not only monstrous but it is revolutionary. As early as the year 1800, Congress attempted to enact a law for settling disputed elections of President. The two Houses failed to agree. But, sir, this attempted legislation had no reference to the mode of counting the electoral vote or the power to count; nor did it contemplate going behind the electoral votes and inquiring as to their validity or accuracy. It expressly disclaimed that power. The article of the Constitution was amended in 1803, two years after this attempt, and yet the provision as to counting the elector. years after this attempt, and yet the provision as to counting the elect-oral vote was not changed. In 1805 the record recites, as it had uniformly done before-

That the Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate did, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors, &c.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that this tremendous power is too great to be reposed in one man, especially one who may be directly interested in the result. When, I ask, has it worked any dangerous result? In 1797 John Adams, as Vice-President and President of the Senate, per-1797 John Adams, as Vice-President and President of the Senate, performed the duty, declared himself elected to the office of President, Thomas Jefferson to the office of Vice-President, and added: "And may the Sovereign of the universe, the Ordainer of civil government on earth, for the preservation of liberty, justice, and peace among men, enable both to discharge the duties of these offices conformably to the Constitution of the United States, with conscientions diligence, punctuality, and perseverance;" and all the people said "Amen." This was at the close of a heated contest when there were thirteen candidates voted for and 139 electoral votes cast, of which Mr. Adams had only 71, or one more than a majority. Being a prominent candidate he not only opened the certificates and declared the vote, but requested the Clerk of the Senate to read the return also before the tellers made the list, and the result was then declared as I have stated. tellers made the list, and the result was then declared as I have stated.

Mr. Speaker, it is much more safe to trust to personal and individual esponsibility in such cases than to a divided responsibility, as would be the case if the two Houses or the proposed commissioners were to exercise the power. In my own State the prisons and canals under the management of boards of inspectors and commissioners have been the most fruitful sources of corruption in State administration. The people of that State at the last election, by a large majority, adopted a constitutional amendment placing the canals and prisons each under the management of a single superintendent. This has been deemed the most wise and safe mode of securing integrity in such administra-

Sir, I am not afraid to trust to individual responsibility whoever may be the President of the Senate. If at this time the Vice-President were a candidate for the Presidency, he would doubtless allow the President pro tempore to act in the count, and thus avoid the example of the elder Adams. The responsibility of the President of the Senate does not approximate to that of the President when elected. Yet the framers of the Constitution and the people in adopting it deemed it most safe to trust the discharge of the duties of the executive office to a single individual. This presidential contest affords lessons for our guidance. A former slave of one of the dominant families in South Carolina, one of whom is now seeking to grasp by force and fraud the political power of that State, has testified before a committee of this House that he was offered the sum of $50,000 to cast his vote as an elector for Tilden and Hendricks. Yet he refused the bribe, and on the personal responsibility resting upon him performed with fidelity the trust resposed in him by the people of that State. One of the republican electors in the State of Louisiana entered the electoral college in that State on the 6th of December last, stating he had been offered a hundred thousand dollars to cast his vote for the democratic candidates, which offer he had refused, and he then performed his duty. The only case in which the use of money seems to have accomplished the purpose for which it was furnished is in the case of the electoral vote of Oregon, where the concurrence and the case of the electoral vote of Oregon, where the concurrence and co-operation of several persons was necessary to consummate the fraudulent and wicked design contemplated, and which would never have been attempted if the responsibility and odium of the act were to rest wholly upon the head of one man.

But, Mr. Speaker, if I am in error in respect to the province of the presiding officer of the Senate, then it is clear that the duty of counting the electoral vote devolves upon the Senate and House, either in joint convention or as separate bodies. This is a power which Congress has no right to delegate. That the proposed bill is a delegation of such power is too plain to admit of argument.

The two Houses are divided in sentiment. Hence the proposal of the joint committee to decide and the provision that the decision shall be final unless both Houses concur in its reversal. It is well known be final unless both Houses concur in its reversal. It is well known that a decision in favor of the republican candidates would not be reversed by the Senate and equally certain that a decision in favor of the democratic candidate would not be reversed by the House. What the democratic candidate would not be reversed by the House. What a farce, then, is the pretended reservation of a power to reverse by the joint action of the two bodies. The law only applies to the count of the vote in the last election, and, as applied to that in the present temper of the two Houses, it is certain, whatever may be the decision, it will be final. If legislation be necessary and proper in regulating the count of the electoral vote, why is the bill thus made temporary and only applicable to a single election? Why not like the proposed act in 1800 and 1824; pass a general law applicable to all cases which may arise until repealed or superseded by an amendment of the Constitution? The reason is obvious. One party claims the right to go behind the electoral vote and to investigate the vote cast in the State. The other wholly denies that right. It is clear that no such power can be exercised until the Constitution shall have been amended so can be exercised until the Constitution shall have been amended so as to authorize it. It is equally certain that on the face of the certificates the election of Hayes and Wheeler is assured. To follow the Constitution leaves no hope. To adopt this bill in its stead, leaving the joint committee to consider such "petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing law be competent and pertinent," opens the door to democratic hope. Had this business been proceeded with without an "if," I should feel less alarmed at the proposed bill.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I object to the selection of judges of the Supreme Court to act in conjunction with and having only co-equal powers with the persons selected by the two Houses of Congress. The proposal to have the Chief-Justice act as one of the grand committee in the legislation attempted in 1800 was abandoned as soon as the objection was suggested. The members of that court should not be invited or required (if this act is a command they are bound to obey, which is doubtful) to take part in proceedings of a political character.

So, Mr. Speaker, the mode of selecting the judges is open to the most grave objections. Why was not the Supreme Court left to select its own members, as the two Houses select theirs? Or, if the judges were to be named in or selected by the bill, why were the five not named or selected? Why leave the selection of one to be made, we know can be exercised until the Constitution shall have been amended so or selected? Why leave the selection of one to be made, we know or selected f Why leave the selection of one to be made, we know not how, to depend upon any contingency or chance f Somebody is to be disappointed as to the composition of the tribunal to decide. While I have no doubt of the earnestness and fidelity of the members of the joint committee reporting this bill, yet as it is to be voted on under the demand for the previous question, without any opportunity for amendment, there is no alternative left but to state these objections to the mode of selecting the committee, which, to my mind, are grave objections to the bill as a measure of practical legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I had intended to call attention to what has been so often said in the discussion upon the various measures of legislation proposed from time to time, against any attempt to influence or control the electoral count by a law of Congress. It has been generally conceded that there is no power to look behind State action, Mr. Pinckney very earnestly claimed in 1800 that such questions belonged to the respective States and to them alone. If any such power should be experised here it is a "case or misses" and on poly he supposed to the supposed should be exercised here it is a "casus omissus," and can only be supplied by an amendment of the Constitution. Suppose the vote of New York in 1868 had determined the result of the presidential contest, does any one doubt that Seymour and Blair would have been declared elected. Yet it is now known to the world, as it was then known to the republicans of New York, that by a false and fraudulent count, conducted in the name of Mr. Tilden, as the chairman of the State committee, the result was reached in that State, and that the chief title of the democratic candidate to the rôle of a reformer is the part he at a late hour acted in bringing to punishment the guilty perpetrators of so monstrous a crime against the integrity of the ballot.

Mr. Speaker, there is great danger that a mode of reaching the result of a presidential canvass in the way suggested by the bill in question will take from the incumbent of that office the dignity with which it has hitherto been clothed.

Mr. Hamilton, speaking upon that subject in a number of the Federalist, after commenting upon the mode of election by electors in each State who could not combine to act corruptly as they might if they all assembled at one place, and that the only power given to the House is to select from the candidates voted for by the people the person to fill the executive office in case of a failure to choose by the electoral vote, says:

This process of election affords a moral certainty that the office of President will never fall to the lot of any man who is not in an eminent degree endowed with the requisite qualifications. Talents for low intripus and the little arts of popularity may alone suffice to elevate a man to the first honors in a single State; but it will require other talents and a different kind of merit to establish him in the esteem and confidence of the whole Union or of so considerable a portion of it as would be necessary to make him a successful candidate for the distinguished office of President of the United States.

Whether we are approaching the exalted phase of the question thus mirrored by the pen of Hamilton or its opposite is the problem still to be solved, and the result may force upon the minds of the people that this Republic has realized at last, in the person, character, and mode of selecting a President, that other picture found in the fervent and eccentric language of John Randolph in the discussion of the Missouri question in 1820. He said:

of the Missouri question in 1820. He said:

The President of the United States possesses great powers and highly responsible functions, and should be looked up to with veneration and deference because he is Chief Magistrate of a people, legally appointed by their suffrages. But a President of the United States appointed by the exclusion of the votes of those who are the same flesh and blood as ourselves is no more the Chief Magistrate of this country than that thing, that pageant, which the majorities in the two Houses proposed to set up just twenty years ago—a President made—by law, no, by the form and color of law, against the principles of the Constitution and in violation of the rights of the freemen of this country. Sir, I would not give a button for him. On his personal account and for his personal qualities I might treat him with respect as an individual, but as Chief Magistrate of this country he would be more odious to my judgment than one of the house of Stuart attempting to seat himself on the throne of England in deflance of the laws of succession and of the opinion of the people.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, this is the first instance in the history Mr. Bland. Mr. Speaker, this is the first instance in the history of our Government that a dispute as to who is the rightfully-elected President of the United States has arisen. It is true that none dispute the fact that Mr. Tilden received nearly a quarter of a million majority of the popular vote, and if he is not declared the President it will also be the first instance in our history where a candidate who received such a majority of the popular vote was not elected. Those who undertake to explain or apologize for this anomaly pretend that it is owing to some mysterious defect in our constitutional provisions for the election of President; but such is not wholly the case. Why the country should now be in a state of political perturcase. Why the country should now be in a state of political perturbation and business paralysis is a question of easy solution. Last June the republican party met in convention at Cincinnati and announced its platform and nominated its candidates for President and Nounced its platform and nominated its candidates for President and Vice-President. A short time thereafter the democratic party met in convention at Saint Louis and announced its platform and nominated its candidates for President and Vice-President. Thus the two political parties went to the country with their respective candidates and declared policy and principles. It was reasonably supposed at that time that the verdict a majority of the people rendered upon the issues presented would be final and respected by all parties as con-

But, Mr. Speaker, when the October elections clearly foreshadowed the victory of the democratic candidates, the question was raised by distinguished republican Senators and politicians as to who should count and how should be counted the electoral vote. Republican orcount and how should be counted the electoral vote. Republican organs throughout the country gave it to be understood that in case the election of Tilden and Hendricks depended upon the electoral votes of South Carolina or Florida, and especially Louisiana, they would never be inaugurated. Just why the vote of these States, or any one of them, should not elect Tilden and Hendricks and yet should elect Hayes and Wheeler, is made clear only when we consider that after the October elections it was pretty certain that if Tilden and Hendricks carried any one of them they would be elected. The republicans had upheld governments in these States so long against the will of the people that they were considered the property of that party. These States had so long dragged at the car of the republican party, riveted there with Federal bayonets, that any attempt to relieve them from their bondage was regarded as treason. It is clear that this controversy was determined upon by republican leaders before the election took place. Whether you call it a conspiracy or what not, all know that this difficulty was foreshadowed by the republican leaders and boldly announced in their leading organs two weeks before the election. They had determined Tilden and Hendricks should not have the electoral votes of any of those States unscrupulous tools of their own for returning boards, and knew

States unscrupulous tools of their own for returning boards, and knew they could be used to count fraudulently—to count majorities into minorities. That they could and would, in plain words, be induced to count the votes of all those States for Hayes and Wheeler, no difference how the people might vote. Knowing these facts, the declaration was made before the election that Tilden and Hendricks should not be inaugurated, if their election depended upon the electoral vote of any of these States. The republican leaders have made good their of any of those States. The republican leaders have made good their threats; hence the fact confronts us that the two if not all three of those States voted for Tilden and Hendricks, but have been counted for Hayes and Wheeler.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of the powers of this House or of Congress to remedy this outrage. I am ready to co-operate in any lawful way to right this wrong, and believing that the bill proposed by the joint committee is the best that can now be devised, I am disposed to give it my support. This bill, however, is intended for this occasion and is not designed as a permanent statute. It only meets an energency that now exists. however, is intended for this occasion and is not designed as a permanent statute. It only meets an emergency that now exists. No law can be devised that will be so perfect in all its scope and details as to be an absolute check upon rascality like this. We have all the laws upon the subject now that our fathers and fathers' fathers believed necessary. You will amend your Constitution, enact statutes, and adopt rules in vain if this sort of politics is to be tolerated in this Government. So long as a people shall sustain a party that thus defies law and decency, our country is liable at any moment to be plunged in a shoreless sea of civil discord and anarchy. No law can be enacted that dishonest and corrupt officials will not evade and falsify for political ends.

Fraud has clothed in legal forms the result of corrupt returning boards, and thus sent here in the garments of law villainous cheats in shape of electoral votes from Florida and Louisiana to be counted in shape of electoral votes from Florida and Louisiana to be counted for Hayes and Wheeler. Force stands ready with Federal bayonets declaring that the man thus elected shall be inaugurated.

Mr. Speaker, as a Representative of the people, I am not inclined to accede to anything that in my judgment looks in any other direction than the ultimate triumph of the right. Yet I must admit that there is too much of the appearance of compromising with wrong in this measure not to call attention to the grave dangers in the future. That Tilden and Hendricks were elected fairly, and honestly elected, President and Vice-President of the United States in the late election I cannot believe any intelligent man doubts. Whether they are to I cannot believe any intelligent man doubts. Whether they are to be cheated out of this victory and the people of their choice depends upon the result of this commission. I dislike even to admit that there be cheated out of this victory and the people of their choice depends upon the result of this commission. I dislike even to admit that there is a possibility of this conspiracy succeeding.

But, sir, there is much here for reflection. The people of this Government are yet to decide at the ballot-box whether a party that has brought so much fraud, corruption, and dishonor upon this country will in the future meet with their favor. If so, I cannot see that there is much hope for our republican institutions. We will soon be upon the level of Mexico, where the boldest political buccaneer by orce and fraud usurps power and oppresses the people till some other freebooters supplants him. Force breeds fraud, and fraud in turn results in force. Louisiana has been governed by force of Federal bayonets. Federal interference installed a bogus government in 1870 and 1872. Again in 1874. The same fraud and force are appealed to in 1877. Shall it succeed? I think not. It is to be hoped that prejudice and passion will die out; that the fearful crisis through which we are now passing will exhibit to the people of this country the terrible dangers that lie in our path as a nation should; we so far depart from the Government and principles of our fathers as to longer tolerate the usurpations of such men as Wells, Anderson, Packard, Kellogg, "et omne genus."

Mr. Speaker, I might compare this Confederacy to the Siamese Twins; each State possessing an independent entity and individuality, all are linked together, and thus constituting the Federal Union, bound together with ligaments of flesh and blood, so that no one of them can possibly suffer without affecting all. If poison be inserted in the veins of one, all become contaminated. Thus we see that the fraud and corruption injected into the body-politic of Louisiana by Federal bayonet States of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, has at last infected the whole body-politic of this Government; and now, from the lakes to the Gulf, and from ocean to ocean, the words "fraud and c removed from office as governor of Louisiana by General Sheridan, because of his alleged corruption and dishonesty. A republican committee of this House, two years ago, condemned the board for doing the very acts for which it is now upheld. Why is it that the doing the very acts for which it is now upheld. Why is it that the frauds condemned two years ago by a republican committee of this House, by the leading journals and statesmen of both parties, should now be apologized for by members on this floor? If it was dishonest to count out a democratic majority then, it is, if possible, more so now; for the majority is larger now than at that time, and the results of vastly greater moment. Our republican friends could afford to cendemn fraud when it affected only the result in Louisiana, but now that the election of Mr. Hayes depends upon upholding and apologizing for that fraud we find a different stand is taken. When it comes to this, that a political party of the numbers, power, and influence of the republican party is willing not only to accept, but to hazard a civil war to secure the supposed advantages of such frauds, then indeed may we despair of our country's perpetuity.

then indeed may we despair of our country's perpetuity.

As I said before, there is no rule or law, no constitution that can be framed so far-reaching in its provisions as to provide for all the possible tricks of evasion and rascally inventions of corrupt, designing men. If our Republic is to stand, it will be because the people will remorselessly frown down the wrong and determinedly uphold

Let it be known that corruption shall be visited with the the right. scorn and detestation of every honest man, come from what party or source it may. What can be expected of a man or party that secures scorn and detestation of every honest man, come from what party or source it may. What can be expected of a man or party that secures position in this Government by false and frandulent count of ballots? The ballot-box contains the voters' will. Who in all this country, or where on earth except in Louisiana, is to be found the man or set of men whose penetrating minds and disinterested, honest judgment can determine the desire of the voter who casts a ballot better than the voter himself as shown by his ballot?

There is no power on earth and none above itsave One, that deserves the title of "the Searcher of hearts," yet this returning board assumes that divine attribute, and our republican friends swear this board has correctly searched the hearts of over twelve thousand male adult citizens of Louisiana, and have determined from their penetrating, all-powerful examination that this twelve thousand men voted directly opposite to what each of them intended or desired. Mr. Speaker, what powerful examination that this twelve thousand men voted directly opposite to what each of them intended or desired. Mr. Speaker, what greatness must be in the future for a State that has for its citizens four men who can fathom the hearts and minds of every voter in it and determine to a demonstration just how each voter desires to cast his ballot, and power to count accordingly. Why, sir, there is no use at all for an election there, because these four men know better than the voter how the voter should or would vote or intended to vote. All that is necessary is a census-table to ascertain the approximate number of voters, so that of that number each candidate may have his due proportion. Still I hardly see the necessity for census-tables if their intention is such as to know just how every voter intends to vote, the board ought to know how many voters there are, their names, personal and political predilections. The advantage of having such powerful men consists in the fact that, with their knowledge of the will of the people, they can declare that will at the proper time without the voters of the State taking the time or trouble to go to the polls. Thus each one of them will save to himself his day's work, instead of going to the election, and the State will be saved the costs attending elections. A happy State, Louisiana! O, for a returning board in all the States! Millions can be saved the people by this happy invention.

But, Mr. Speaker, why the necessity of any forms of election at all in Louisiana or elsewhere? If these great men can so accurately judge the will of the people of Louisiana, why not of the whole nation? Their penetration of hearts cannot be confined to the dangers of that State alone. Being the searcher of all hearts and knowing the will and intent of people in this respect, why not say to these eminent men: Take control of this Government; you know the will of the people so perfectly that you will never make a mistake; you can always govern us according to our will without asking us any can always govern us according to our will without asking us any questions on that subject? May the splinters of this board never grow less, but multiply until it is shivered and splintered from Louisiana to Maine. But we had forgotten Florida. Money and troops seem to have been the means of enlightening the board there. There a Tilden majority was transferred into a Hayes majority. It is true that Governor Stearns said it would require money and troops to accomplish that feat of legerdemain. Chandler was equal to the emergency. So troops were ordered to Florida to see a fair count for Hayes and a fraudulent count for Tilden.

This Louisiana-returning board consisted of two white men and two

This Louisiana-returning board consisted of two white men and two negroes, all republicans, and, what is still worse, all rogues. The law made some pretense of fairness by requiring that both political parties should be represented in the board, but that small piece of justice was denied the democratic party. I stated before that this board had been condemned to infamy in the house of its friends. I shall now quote from the report of the select committee on the condition of the South in their report made to the Forty-third Congress. That Congress we all know was republican. This committee was a republican committee, Mr. Wheeler, late candidate of that party for the high office of Vice-President, being a member of the committee. This committee goes on to say: committee goes on to say:

The law provides that this board shall consist of five persons "from all political parties." It consisted at the opening of their last session of five republicans, upon the resignation of one of whom (General Longstreet) Mr. Arroyo, a conservative, was taken to fill the vacancy. After protesting against the action of the board in secret session he resigned about the conclusion of their labors, and his place was not filled; so that, as your committee think, the law as to the constitution of the board was not complied with.

Remember that the same members of the board acted at the last Remember that the same members of the board acted at the last election, and under this same law alluded to in this report. At the last election the democrats requested that the law be complied with by the appointment of a democrat upon the board. This request was persistently refused. We here have the testimony of a republican committee that the law in 1874 and 1876 was not complied with. This same committee further on uses the following language:

Your committee are therefore constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, in rejecting these returns in the parish of Rapides and giving the seats for that parish to the republican candidates, was arbitrary, unfair, and without warrant of law. If the committee were to go behind the papers before the board and consider the alleged charge of intimidation upon the proofs before the committee, their finding would necessarily be the same. It was asserted in Governor Wells's affidavit that the McEnery officials had usurped the offices of the parish, and thereby intimidated voters. Immediately after the 14th of September, when the Kellogg authorities in New Orleans were put out by the Penn authorities, certain changes took place in some of the parishes. When the news from New Orleans reached these parishes the McEnery officials demanded their places of the Kellogg officials, and they were at once given up. When the Federal Government intervened and unseated the McEnery authorities, the Kellogg officials demanded and received back their places; but in Rapides some time seems to have elapsed before the Kellogg officials took their places back; indeed, the McEnery register of deeds was still acting as such when your committee were in New Orleans, the Kellogg register never having come to reclaim the place, which is said to be worth nothing.

If the returning board, in the language of this republican committee, acted arbitrarily, unfairly, and without warrant of law in 1874, in counting out members of the Legislature, what could we expect of them when the far greater prize of the Presidency was at stake? The past conduct of this board as here shown was guarantee sufficient to the republican managers here at Washington that Hayes would be counted in provided the troops and money were forthcoming. The troops and money were duly on hand as required. The result was that a clear democratic majority of over 8,000 was transferred into a republican majority of near 4,000, making a difference of 12,000 votes as counted by the returning board and as actually cast at the polls. Hence, Hayes is declared elected and Tilden defeated. Is this arbitrary, unfair, and without warrant of law? All honest men, it seems to me, would think it a little arbitrary, unfair, and without warrant of law. This report is full of sweeping condemnations of this board. I cannot do better than to read a little further from this same book. On page 4 is the following:

On page 4 is the following: The action of the returning board in the parish of Rapides alone changed the political complexion of the lower house, but their action in other parishes was equally objectionable. For instance, in Iberia Parish it was claimed before your committee that the vote of poll No. 1 in that parish had been rejected on account of intimidation, but the papers produced by the clerk of the board showed no such proof whatever. One of the counsel, Mr. Ray, produced some affidavits which he declared had been submitted to the board by another of the counsel, General Campbell. The conservative counsel insisted these papers had never been before the board. Opportunity was given to the republican counsel to show the papers had been submitted; but the testimony offered for that purpose by them so far, however, from establishing that fact, established the reverse.

Upon the general subject of the state of affairs in the South, and as to whether the alleged wrongs to colored citizeas for political offenses are real or were asserted without due foundation, your committee took such proof as the opportunity offered. Both parties agreed upon four parishes as samples of the condition of affairs in that respect in the State. Of these, owing to the impossibility of procuring witnesses from the locality in time, your committee were obliged to confine their especial examination to two parishes most accessible. As to these parishes they received all the testimony that was offered, and, in addition, they received all the testimony that was offered, and, in addition, they received all the testimony of affairs in other parts of the State.

As a whole, they are constrained to say that the intention charged is not borne out by the facts before us. No go iseral intimidation of republican voters was established; no colored man was produced who had been threatened or assaulted by any conservative because of political opinion, or discharged from employment or refused employment. Of all those who testified to intimidation there was hardly any one who of his own knowledge could specify a reliable instance of such acts, and of the white men who were produced to testify generally on such subjects, very nearly all, if not every single one, was the holder of an office. Throughout the rural districts of the State the number of white republicans are very few; it hardly extends beyond those holding office and those connected with them. No witness, we believe, succeeded in naming, in any parish, five republicans who supported the Kellogg government who were not themselves office-holders or related to office-holders or those having official employment.

It is clearly shown here that there was no intimidation as charged

It is clearly shown here that there was no intimidation as charged in 1874. Yet the democrats carried the State then, carried it without any intimidation. If they could carry the State in 1874 without intimidation, why not in 1876? If the returning board in 1874 falsely charged intimidation for the purpose of counting out a democratic majority, "arbitrarily, unfairly, and without warrant of law," why could they not falsely charge the same reason for an arbitrary, unfair, and illegal count in 1876?

Mr. Speaker, this is too plain for argument, it is too illegal.

Mr. Speaker, this is too plain for argument, it is too villianous to talk about. And yet we are asked to give full faith and credit to this false count. We are told that there is no power to go behind this action. I had always supposed that fraud made null and void everything it entered into.

But, sir, I shall go on with this very interesting report. On page 6 we find the following pertinent statement:

On the other hand, it was in evidence that blacks who sought to act with the conservative party were, on their part, sometimes exposed to enmity and abuse. In the interior one colored man was shot for making a conservative speech, and in New Orleans it appeared from the testimony that colored men who sought to co-operate with the conservatives were subject to so much abuse from the police and otherwise that an association of lawyers volunteered to protect them but without effect.

The radical ox is here gored. It is the republicans who do the work of intimidation, but I suppose the board counted all the intimida-

But, sir, I shall pass on to page 7 of this report, made by a republican committee, of which WILLIAM A. WHEELER was a member, and unanimously adopted:

unanimously adopted:

With this conviction is a general want of confidence in the integrity of the existing State and local officials, a want of confidence equally in their purposes and in their personnel, which is accompanied by the paralyzation of business and destruction of values. The most hopeful witness produced by the Kellogg party, while he declared that business was in a sounder condition than ever before, because there was less credit, has since declared that "there was no prosperity." The securities of the State have fallen in two years from 70 or 80 to 25; of the city of New Orleans, from 80 or 90 to 30 or 40, while the fall in bank shares, railway shares, city and other corporate companies have, in a degree corresponded. Throughout the rural districts of the State the negroes, reared in habits of reliance upon their masters for support, and in a community in which the members are always ready to divide the necessaries of life with each other, not regarding such action as very will, and having immunity from punishment from the nature of the local officials, had come to filehing and stealing fruit, vegetables, and poultry so generally—as Bishop Wilmarth stated without contradiction from any source—that the raising of these articles had to be entirely abandoned, to the great distress of the white people, while within the parishes, as well as in New Orleans, the taxation had been carried almost literally to the extent of confiscation. In New Orleans the assessors are paid a commission for the amount assessed, and houses and stores are to be had there for the taxes. In Natchitoches, the taxation reached about 8 per cent. of the assessed value on the property. In many parishes all the white republicans and all the office-holders belong to a single family. There are five of the Greens in office in Lincoln; there are seven of the Boults in office in Natchitoches. As the people saw taxation increase and prosperity diminish, as they grew poor while officials grew rich, they became naturally sore. That they love their rulers cannot be pretended.

Here we have it. The reason for democratic majorities in Louisiana is the same as elsewhere, it is because of their miserable governand is the same as elsewhere, it is because of their miserable government under carpet-bag rule. As the people saw taxation increase and prosperity diminish, as they grew poor while officers grew rich, they became naturally sore, yes, they became discontented and tired of such government. There is too much of that government in Louisiana and many other places, where officers grow rich while tax-payers grow poor. The difference is, that elsewhere the tax-payer has his remedy by voting the democratic ticket or some other ticket, and they turn out of place these sleek officers who are growing rich, fattening off the hard earnings of the neonle; but in Louisiana troops tening off the hard earnings of the people; but in Louisiana troops and money attend the count. The ballot avails not as against the and money attend the count. The ballot avails not as against the rich office-holder. The beaks of corrupt official plunderers are plunged deep in the writhing flesh of the people. Troops and money have kept them down. Bayonets have glistened in their teeth as a warning to be quiet while they are being devoured. Great God! And all this in free America.

Mr. Speaker, I will read one of the last paragraphs of this report, for it is significant. It is as follows:

Indeed, in our judgment the substantial citizens of the State will submit to any fair determination of the question of the late elections, or to anything by which they can secure a firm and good government. What they seek is peace and an opportunity for prosperity; to that end they will support any form of government that will afford them just protection in their business and personal relations. In their distress they have got beyond any mere question of political party. They regard themselves as practically without government and without the power to form

Now, sir, here is a solemn admission by a republican committee, of which WILLIAM A. WHEELER was a member, that the people of Louisiwhich WILLIAM A. WHEELER was a member, that the people of Louisiana want peace. They want good government. I have shown from this report that they had not a good government, but, on the contrary, taxes increased while prosperity waned. The people grew poor while officers grew rich. The republican party failed to give them good government. Had they not the right, had they not the duty to perform of voting the ticket of that party they believed would give them good government? Was it not the duty of this returning board to count that ticket or ballot as it was actually cast? But troops and money, fraud and force, stood in the way. Hayes must have Louisiana. He could not be elected without it. This simple fact accounts for many of the supposed mysteries of the late election.

Mr. Speaker, no one can now look to the 5th of March next with a vision clear and see who shall be then inaugurated. If Tilden and Hendricks succeed at last, if Tilden then takes the seat to which he Hendricks succeed at last, if Tilden then takes the seat to which he is in all honesty and justice entitled, it will be such a triumph of right over wrong, of law and order over force and fraud, as will place this Republic on firmer foundations than ever before. As a people, we will enter the paths of political regeneration and business prosperity. On the other hand, if fraud, incased in legal forms and technical terms, thwarts at this time the known will of the people, I believe a sense of justice that always characterizes the American people will set its seal of condemnation upon the party forcing its candidates into office against the known merits of the case.

I shall vote for the bill providing for a mode of counting the electoral vote, because I hope it will secure substantial justice, and because, unless that bill passes there is no possibility of any agreement at all between the House and the Senate. Unless this bill shall settle the dispute the President of the Senate will declare Hayes and Wheeler elected and the House Tilden and Hendricks, thus setting up a dual Presidency and a conflict of authority that will result in all the horrors of civil conflict, the end of which no man can see but, I venture to say would be the downfall of our liberties and the end of the world's hope of constitutional Government resting upon the freeman's will as expressed at the ballot-box.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I do not rise to discuss the provisions of this little the grant and the canada and the c

Mr. SOUTHARD. I do not rise to discuss the provisions of this Mr. SOUTHARD. I do not rise to discuss the provisions of this bill, but simply to suggest the propriety of an amendment. The bill provides for referring to this commission disputed questions in those cases only where there are two sets of returns from a State. Now in one case there is a question as to whether there is a State or not; I refer to Colorado. That question, I think, is one of the highest importance, and it should be appropriately referred to this commission if the bill is to become a law. I therefore suggest as an amendment to section 1 the following: In line 27, after the word "State," insert the words "except as hereinafter provided;" and also to amend section 2 by inserting in line 1, after the word "that," these words:

If there is a question whether or not any State has been duly admitted into the

If there is a question whether or not any State has been duly admitted into the Union and was entitled to vote for presidential electors on the 7th day of November, 1876, or

At a proper time, if I can have an opportunity, I propose to submit these amendments to a vote of the House. Twice, in cases similar to this, has Congress refused to count the electoral votes except hypo-thetically. The one was in 1821, in the case of Missouri; the other thetically.

in 1837, in the case of Michigan. There is a higher question involved in this Colorado case than in determining simply which one of two sets of votes shall be counted in a State admitted to be a State within the Union. And it involves a constitutional question so grave that the House Judiciary Committee is divided in its opinion upon it. Hence the appropriateness of its reference to this commission proposed under this bill.

I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague [Mr. VANCE.] Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill under scussion. No one has been more anxious than I have been to see a discussion. No one has been more anxious than I have been to see a peaceable, fair solution of the presidential question; no one has sought more earnestly for reasons to support the bill. But the examination I have given strengthens my conviction that it should not pass. I do not indorse the argument advanced by many on the other side of this House and in the Senate, that the President of the Senate is the sole judge, and shall open and count the electoral vote. Such an argument is respectable only because it is andacious. I can add nothing to what has been said on this point.

I believe the measure is unconstitutional. The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers merely; whatever power Congress has, it obtains from the Constitution, through which all powers are granted. The two Houses of Congress have no power to legislate away their rights, no power to appoint (partly by chance, Congress has, it obtains from the Constitution, through which all powers are granted. The two Houses of Congress have no power to legislate away their rights, no power to appoint (partly by chance, perhaps) a tribunal to determine a grave question that they may fear to meet squarely and decide fairly.

This bill provides only a remedy for the present election. I have great confidence in the patriotism and honesty of the Representatives and Senators who have signed the report accompanying the bill. They have devoted much labor and brought the experience of years of public service to bear upon the question in controversy. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the result is a bill providing for this occasion only a sort of temporary affair, a ponton bridge to carry the country over the point of danger, or supposed danger. It leaves the solution of this matter to the future. Believing as I do that the Constitution has given to the House of Representatives and the Senate the power and has made it their duty to count the electoral vote, as well as to decide questions pertaining thereto, any bill that looks toward throwing away this power and avoiding this duty should not pass. It is not in our power to avoid the great responsibilities of the occasion. The difficulties that beset the country, and perhaps threaten its future, should be met promptly, decided fairly, and to such effect as will hereafter render their recurrence impossible. This is no time to temporize; no time to divide the responsibility with a part of another branch of the Government. The Senate and House should determine this question in joint convention, as provided by the Constitution, under the facts and the law, in the light of their oaths, as their consciences honestly dictate, without fear of danger or hope of reward. When this is done, the country will be satisfied; and not until then.

While opposing the bill I have no reflections to make or fears to express regarding the commission proposed by it. If law or justice or equity pervails, the result cann examined the more clearly is this seen.

I believe, further, that a conspiracy was organized immediately after the election, having for its object the overthrow of the verdict of the people by means of false returns and partisan and pliable returning boards in certain States. I am unwilling to recognize the power of this conspiracy, even as far as to admit that there is a doubt as to the result of the election; and support of this bill does, in my judgment, permit such a doubt to obtain.

I have not the time to speak of these matters as they deserve. Debate is necessarily limited, and I only sought the floor to enter my protest against a measure I believe to be inexpedient and unconstitutional.

protest against a measure I believe to be inexpedient and unconstitutional.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, for several months prior to last November, the minds of the people of this country were wrought up to intensest excitement over the coming presidential election—an excitement, however, almost become normal, from its regular recurrence every four years. For three years the people had been groaning under the effects of the financial panic of 1873. Thousands and hundreds of thousands who had been rich, or thought themselves rich—enjoying all the comforts and luxuries which riches bring—had been reduced to the verge of poverty. Thousands had been reduced from competency to want. All of these looked to the 7th of November as the day when the darkness would be at last dispelled, and the gray dawn of prosperity would begin to climb up from the horizon. Thousands prayed that they might be able to stave off judgment or execution until that day. Thousands prayed that they might keep body and soul together until that day.

Nearly all classes believed that the sun of prosperity which had set on the 18th day of September, 1873, would arise again on the 7th day of November, 1876. Democrats so hoped, because they believed it would be the day when a beginning of the change in the management of national affairs would be made. Republicans so hoped, because they thought it would be the commencement of another four years of power, a term they would in the future wield for good. All shades of people, partisan and non-partisan, thought it would be an auspicious day, because thenceforth for four years we would have a settled policy, and business men could safely freight their argosies for adventhat the soldier who ruled over this free Republic, would never permit a democratic President to be inaugurated. But their forebodings were regarded more as the creaking of funeral ravens, than the utterances of even sagacious owls.

The people believed that the election would occur on the 7th of November, and they never dreamed that it would not be completed on that day. They knew that the votes would be counted—must be counted. But to them such count was as natural and normal an act as the coming out of the stars, when the sun drops behind the curtain of the west on a clear and cloudless evening.

The 7th of November passed; the 8th came. A shout went up from nearly five millions of democratic throats that Tilden had been elected. nearly five millions of democratic throats that Tilden had been elected. Conservative republicans breathed freely and a large proportion of them were not displeased at the result. But all at once there appeared in the political arena a new factor in presidential elections. Messages flashed along the wiry net which spreads over this news-loving land, and one word was the burden of every message. A word already known to skilled political manipulators, but to the masses, yet uncoined. Their simple tongues were not yet sufficiently twisted for its proper pronunciation. A word to-day as ominous of horrid fancies, as that of cooling-board on which the ghastly cadaver is laid, ready for the dissecting-knife. Returning board! a board on which ballots are laid, and turned and turned until they take as varied shapes as do bits of colored glass in the barrel of a kaleidoscope. A board at which a J. Madison Wells can sit and conjure up more easily, dead men's souls to cast republican votes, than Hume or any other spiritualist can, on tables in darkened rooms, call up the spirits of dear Lady Marys to indite loving missives to our embassadorial Pierponts. Wells; euphonious name—so rich, so suggestive—from thy fathomless depths, what oceans of water may flow to wash out the name of Tilden from euphonious name—so rich, so suggestive—from thy fathomless depths, what oceans of water may flow to wash out the name of Tilden from 10,000 inky ballots! From thy deep hidden sources, what floods of mineral fluids, from which that great alchemist Zachariah can precipitate republican suffrages! Wells! I have seen thee, Wells! Thou satests here on this floor the other day, arraigned before the bar of the House, and more than two hundred republican eyes looked lovingly upon thy angelic face! What a halo surrounded thy beauteous lineaments in the eyes of thy party admirers! As, in Correggio's wonderful picture, the light falls not upon the virgin's child, but emanates from it, so to thy friends on the other side of this House, thy face beamed with an effulgent light, borrowed from no miserable orb set in the firmament to give light by day, but a holy light from within, joyous—made up of no old-fashioned prismatic rays, but with newer gleams not yet brought out by prism, or analyzed by spectrum; a light beauteous, heavenly, republican!

I watched my friends on the other side, when that incarnation of the Fury 'Hate' sat there, and I wondered and wondered; and I felt that party prejudice was indeed an inseparable element with the right of self-government. It was not born yesterday or the day before. William the Silent, who lifted the bottom of the briny deep, and transformed it into the home of three millions of freemen, was charged by thousands of his countrymen with being the minion of the Kirg of Erape. Olden Barrayaldt's patrictic heart was almost charged by thousands of his countrymen with being the minion of the King of France. Olden-Barneveldt's patriotic heart was almost broken, because more than half of the free Netherlands believed him broken, because more than half of the free Netherlands believed him in the pay of Philip III. Our own Washington, whom we reverence and can scarcely credit with having been fashioned from common human clay, was charged with being corrupt by many of his contemporaries. We are all governed by prejudice, and he who thinks himself fairest, in fact is the most prejudiced of all. When a gentleman on that side (acknowledged pure and wise) left his seat to take by the hand that man, whom Louisiana corruption had thrown to the surface. I could not help contrasting his act with the proud words of the Douglas, when Marmion offered him his hand:

My castles are my king's alone, From turret to foundation stone; The hand of Douglas is his own, And never shall in friendly grasp, The hand of such as Marmion clasp.

From this side of the House we looked upon that man as the embodiment of all that is corrupt in politics. Had some modern Vulcan struck him on the head, we would scarcely have been surprised if the demon of fraud had sprung from under the hammer's blow, armed cap-a-pie with rottenness and perjury. We almost believed that his stooping form was bent under wagon-loads of perjured affidavits. Who are the prejudiced? They on the other side of the House or we on this? on this ?

on this? But, Mr. Speaker, five millions of American voters would have looked upon J. Madison Wells as we did. Five millions of men, free Americans, believe that that man has defrauded them out of their dearest right, the right of free ballot. These five million men believe that when they were so defrauded, free republican institutions received a staggering blow; and they demanded of the American Congress that it should redress their wrong. They see in it the only protection of the liberty won by our forefathers in an eight years' war with the proudest of earth's nations. They ask us to make the Union, which cost so lately 600,000 human lives and a treasure almost fabulous—to make that Union a blessing and not a curse. They ask if Mason and Dixon's line was blotted out only that fraud might the more easily stalk back and forth over it. Was this the reward of their perils and all they got for over two thousand millions of debt? Sir, are these the mutterings of heated imaginations, of partisan prejudice? It may be so. But men die from imaginary diseases, and nations sometimes grow insane, and in their insanity they are fearful. All France was insane less than a hundred years ago. Human blood was its aliment and the fumes of blood its sweetest incense.

The people appealed to Congress after the 6th of December last for redress of evils. One-half of the American people so appealed; ay, more than half. They believed they had been defrauded. They asked Congress to see if it were true, and, if true, to correct the evil. But all at once they found the fraud could not be corrected, or they were told that it could not be corrected; they were told to assume a Christian spirit if they have it not, and to be patient, and in four years they could themselves get their rights; that no rights had been lost; at the very worst they were only in abeyance. Nearly five millons of voters have so appealed to us. Five millions of men of convictions, or of deep party prejudices—prejudices as binding upon themselves as the deepest convictions.

On the other hand nearly five millions of men have been taught to believe that by the fair and honest yets of the nearle Mr. Haves was

On the other hand nearly five millions of men have been taught to believe that by the fair and honest vote of the people Mr. Hayes was elected; that the people were intimidated at the polls; and that the returning boards but corrected existing evils. And these five millions of voters are men of convictions, or of party prejudices as binding upon themselves, as the deepest convictions. It would be worse than idle, it would be contemptible folly, for either side to assert that the five millions of men on the other side were but acting a part; that they do not believe what they say.

I hold, Mr. Speaker, that the great masses of both parties—the great masses of the democratic party and the great masses of the republican party—honestly believe that their own candidate for the presidency was honestly elected. History is full of such honest difference of opinion. And I know too many men on the other side of this House; men in whose honor I would trust my dearest secrets, my most paramount interest; men who would die for principle's sake; these men are as earnest as I am, and as honest. I am not more certain that yesterday's sun rose, passed across our sky, and set at evening than that Mr. Tilden was honestly and fairly elected. My friends on this side of the House all believe this. Which side shall put itself upon the house-top and thank God for not being as other men are? Which side can claim to be free from party prejudices at this trying time? Which side can claim that its judgment is clearer and less clouded by prejudices than is the judgment of the other side? That side has come to the belief that J. Madison Wells is an honest citizen, a bold but pure patriot, while we over here believe him capable of any political crime. And it is to us, to the members of this House and to the members of the Senate, equally prejudiced as ourselves, divided as we are—to these two Houses two great armies, aggregating nearly ten millions of men—these two great armies of nearly five millions each, appeal to these two Houses for right and justice.

great armies of nearly five millions each, appeal to these two Houses for right and justice.

What is obligatory upon these two Houses? One of the most solemn duties ever falling to the lot of legislators, a duty to do equal rights to all, wrong to none. The duty to set in motion the machinery which shall declare who shall be the constitutional ruler of this land for the next four years. The duty to declare it, and to declare it in such manner that these two great armies aggregating ten millions of men shall be satisfied with the declaration; shall feel satisfied that ours is no experimental government to weather through a four years' voyage, but in danger each recurring four years of ship wreck; satisfied, that they may have an abiding faith that the free Government of their fathers shall be the free Government of their children's children to far distant ages.

Mr. Speaker, what evidence has been given by the two Houses of Congress during the past two months that these two great armies shall be thus satisfied? None, sir; none. I, for my own part, have all the time felt an abiding faith that men of both Houses would, before it should be too late, rise above party. Sir, a peaceful and satisfactory solution to this question insures to me personally, comfort and competency in my journey down the nether slope of life; any other solution will bring to me and mine sure, absolute ruin. Yet, sir, with this knowledge I have been cheerful through these past two months—cheerful because hopeful. Not so the great mass of the people.

Sir, acts and deeds speak a people's will far more loudly than their words. Watch the path of trade for the past two months, what do you see? Stagnation in every branch. Poverty has become mendicancy. Stalwart muscle meets you on every street and in every city, and stretches out brawny arms asking for alms. A few months since muscle asked for leave to toil, but now it asks for bread for self, bread for wife, and bread for starving little ones. Sir, there are more beggars to be met with in a single day in America than could be met in a hundred days in any European land except Italy; and there it is the craft which begs—lame, halt, blind, decrepit men, women, and children, whose misfortunes are their fortunes, their stock in trade; there the staff of the beggar is his staff of life; able-bodied men rarely are met begging anywhere in the Old World. But here, how different! Sir, a few years ago, an American abroad constantly had cause for self-gratulation, when he compared the mendicancy of older lands with the almost total absence of it in his own favored land. To-day he can do no such thing. Here in Washington one will meet more healthy, able-bodied men, women, and children asking alms in a single day, than he would meet in Northern Europe in a summer's tour. Mr. Speaker, there are to-day probably from a quarter to half a million of idle men in this land; men, idle not from choice, but because they cannot get work to do.

Sir, my remarks up to this time may seem to have no bearing upon the question before us. But in my opinion they have great bearing. Gnawing bellies do not conduce to cool heads. "Beware of yon lean Cassius" was not Cæsar's idle word. It sprang from his knowledge of human nature. Paris well fed and full of toil—rewarded toil—would never have given Robespierre to the world. Paris drank its fill of blood, because wine and oil were out of the people's reach. Paris had its carnival of horrors because Paris had no bread upon its board. A political crisis such as is now upon the country, would not be half so dangerous to the perpetuity of our institutions, it we were not also struggling under the weight of a financial crisis. Legislators should

A political crisis such as is now upon the country, would not be half so dangerous to the perpetuity of our institutions, if we were not also struggling under the weight of a financial crisis. Legislators should look at the atmosphere of a country when they make laws. On the open plains of my own State a thousand Krupp guis fired, full-charged at once, would cause but a harmless vibration in the clear atmosphere. Yet a pistol-shot might cause a thousand tons to tumble from one of the Jungfrau's glaciers. The traveler among Alpine snows is warned by his skillful guide to step lightly, to speak with bated breath, for a heavy footfall, a quick-spoken word, might cause an avalanche to sweep him and his comrades into hopeless destruction. A can of nitroglycerine lay buried for months in a laborer's back yard, yet a few days since the stroke of a pick upon the frozen ground, caused the concentrated monster to explode, and the owner's body, in tiny quivering bits, no piece weighing over five pounds, was gathered in a hamper-basket.

The people of this land are deeply moved. The mutterings of human passion are heard deep and hoarse. Let us tread lightly. Let us not go back upon our path of duty, but let us tread the onward path firmly but lightly. A few years ago a shot fired off the harbor of a southern city, set on fire a train which caused more destruction than ever before happened in any four years.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] said lest night that he despised the threat of civil war. That was bold language, and I admire the courage of the speaker. I admired too the pluck of the bull when he confronted with his wrinkled brow the oncoming locomotive; but his ground-up careass was not a noble or cheering picture.

I admired too the pluck of the bull when he confronted with his wrinkled brow the oncoming locomotive; but his ground-up carcass was not a noble or cheering picture. Sir, I am afraid of civil war. It's very name causes me to shudder. It may often times be a necessity, but one from which a free people should ever recoil. No free people ever came out of one without injury. Civil wars in despotisms are often the seeds, the very watering of liberty, but never in free lands. Civil war sent Tarquin to his doom and made Rome free. Civil war sent liberty to its tomb and gave Rome her Cæsar. Civil war broke forever the power of the tyrantin the Escurial and gave to watery Holland a free republic; but civil war gave to France her Napoleon. Civil war gave to America our own grand Republic—let us be on our guard lest civil war may change the name of President into Imperator.

the Escurial and gave to watery Holland a free republic; but civil war gave to France her Napoleon. Civil war gave to America our own grand Republic—let us be on our guard lest civil war may change the name of President into Imperator.

Mr. Speaker, after the meetings of the electors on the 6th of December last, a new and, as far as the masses of our people understood the question, a strange and novel difficulty arose. The people had thought that when the election was over on the night of the 7th of November the thing was finished. They thought that the count of the electoral vote was a simple problem; as simple as the counting by the bank-teller of their daily savings brought to the bank's counter. Who among our forty-five millions of people ever dreamed that a new demon of discord would spring upon the political arena? Not one in a thousand; nay, not one probably in ten thousand.

It is true this question was one of deep interest seventy-seven years ago. But it had passed from men's memory. In the year 1800 the Congress of the United States had attempted to solve the problem as to how the electoral votes should be counted. But the people had an idea that the counting of these votes was a simple matter of addition. And when the wires carried from Washington the news that the Senate and House of Representatives were disputing as to the method to be adopted, demands came pouring in upon us from cities and from towns—from hamlets and from farm-houses—demands that we should count the votes in accordance with time-honored custom, that we should count the votes as our fathers had counted them. Wires and mails carried back from Senators and from Members of this House, assurances to cities and to towns—to hamlets and to farm-houses, that we would count the votes as our fathers had counted them, that we would count the votes in accordance with time-honored custom. But how had our fathers counted the votes? What was the time-honored custom? Men of both branches of Congress mounted upon party platforms, and, chameleon-like, they took the color of the planks on which they were standing. Party and party prejudice again became the prominent factors in the solution of the great and absorbing question.

What was the time-honored custom? Men of both branches of Congress mounted upon party platforms, and, chameleon-like, they took the color of the planks on which they were standing. Party and party prejudice again became the prominent factors in the solution of the great and absorbing question.

Sir, I know I am a partisan. But I feel in my innermost heart that party and party prejudice are not clouding my judgment. You, Mr. Speaker, think the same of yourself. The gentlemen on the other side of this floor think the same. Opinion crystallizes itself, as do two metallic substances held in solution by a subtle fluid when the pole of a battery is inserted into it, or when some chemical is dropped in it; one metal goes to one side of the glass and takes its own peculiar shape, its angles are fixed and defined; the other metal recedes to the opposite side of the glass and assumes its own peculiar forms, with angles fixed and defined. Each crystal is so exact that the practiced eye of the metallurgist, need look but once to know the name and properties of each separated metal.

Party prejudices precipitated the soluble into the insoluble, the undefined into certain and solid. One set of men said the President of the Senate has decided this question regularly since 1787; and it was believed such solution would insure the election of Governor Hayes. Sir, was the result wished, the cause of the solution adopted? It is not for me to decide. What right have I to dive into men's consciences and to assert that they are not as honest as I? Honi soit qui mal y pense!

Among those who so hold, some said the President of the Senate could only count the votes ministerially; others said he had the right to weigh, to scrutinize, to decide which certificates should be received, which refused; another set of men said Congress had the sole right, and it was its sole duty to count the votes, and that Congress had reg-

And these men again differed among themselves: one set said the act of counting was an affirmative act of both Houses acting as one body; another that it was an affirmative act of the two Houses actbody; another that it was an affirmative act of the two Houses acting as separate bodies; that it required the acquiescence of each House before a vote could be counted. Another that, acting as separate bodies, it required the joint act of the two bodies to reject a vote. One set said that the two Houses, whether acting as one body or as separate bodies, had no right to go behind the certificates coming from free and sovereign States. Another set said that the two Houses, either acting as one body or acting as separate bodies, had the right, and it was their duty, to go behind the certificates and examine and determine aliunde if the votes contained in the certificates were the true votes of the people of sovereign free States.

true votes of the people of sovereign free States.

One set held firmly that the whole decision of the vote as to the President belonged to the House of Representatives; and the whole decision as to the vote for Vice-President belonged to the Senate. This last position would insure the election of Governor Tilden, either by the electoral vote or would send it to the House, when he would certainly be elected. Was the result wished for, the reason of the assumption? Who on the other side of this House shall say such was the fact? What right have they to dive into other men's consciences and to assert that gentlemen on this side of the House are not as honger than the state of the House are not as honger th est as they? Honi soit qui mal y pense. The country at last found that men's opinions were thus divided and the people became fearfully alarmed. "What," they asked, "will be the result? Are we to have fraud count in a President; shall fraud prevent the counting in a President? If so, free government, the very foundation of which is a free ballot, will be lost. Even if no immediate evil result from the thing, the worm will have entered the root of the great tree, and rottenness and death will surely ensue."

"But worse than that the composition of the two Houses of Congres "But worse than that the composition of the two Houses of Congress is such that one House will adopt one view, the other House the other view of the question. The Senate through its President will declare Mr. Hayes President, and the present incumbent of the presidential chair will recognize the Senate's choice and will hand over to him the paraphernalia, all the insignia of office. The great heads of the Executive Departments of the Government will recognize him as the President. The Army through its generals will recognize him as the President. He will be thus a de facto President, and recognized by the Senate and by the republican party as the de jure President. The House of Representatives performing its sworn duty, its solemn sworn duty, will proceed to elect and declare Mr. Tilden the President of the United States. He will be by them and by the democratic party recognized as the de jure President, and then what?"

President of the United States. He will be by them and by the democratic party recognized as the de jure President, and then what?"

Mr. Speaker, I, too, ask, "then what?" Nor I, nor you can answer that question. No man lives who can answer that question. No man is so gifted with prescience or so cursed by foresight as to be able to answer that question. To be able to look into the abysm of woe which might be the result of this state of affairs would indeed be a curse. So long as the thing should remain uncertain there would be hope; but could the patriot see clearly the result, hope might depart forever.

This brings me to that stage of my remarks when it may be proper for me to say something of the legal aspects of the case as they present themselves to my mind. The Constitution says:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of epresentatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

Mark the words—"all the certificates." This very language shows the framers of the Constitution did not intend that the President of the Senate should decide which were the true certificates; but he shall open them all, spurious as well as true. For otherwise they would have said open the certificates, using the definite article, making him the judge as to which were the certificates and which were not the certificates; or they would have said open the true certificates, or the proper certificates, or the certified certificates. But it says no such thing, but open all the certificates. He has received various papers purporting to be certificates. They have been in his hands for safe-keeping, he being an officer in continuous existence. He must keep them under seal until he finds himself in the presence of the two Houses, for the Constitution says he shall then open them, which means he shall not open them until in such presence. He therefore cannot know until he does so open them which are the true and which are false certificates. He has received papers sealed up as ordered by the Constitution. He knows nothing of what those seals cover except that they were given him by men representing them-selves as messengers from electors of States, or that they were sent him by certain officers of the States, as the case may be. His duty is to open them. Of that there is no doubt. That he should open every sealed package purporting to be certificates there can, I think, be no doubt. Then what?

doubt. Then what?

The vote shall be counted—by whom? By the President of the Senate? Surely not. It is hard for me to believe that any one not carried away by partisanship should claim that he should count. I say it is hard to believe this, yet what right have I to dive into men's consciences? But let us examine the structure of the sentence, examine it as Saxon English—as plain English.

There is a general acknowledgment, Mr. Speaker, that the framers of the American Constitution wrote not only good English but exceedingly terse English. They discarded verbiage. They said as much as possible in the fewest words. Now, had they intended the President of the Senate should count the votes would they not have said so? See how simple the change in the construction of the sentence would be to devolve this high duty upon this officer: "shall, in tence would be to devolve this high duty upon this officer: "shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives open all the certificates and then count the votes." Four words would have made the thing certain, but they used six words—"the votes shall then be counted;" or they might have used the same phraseology and by adding two words would have made the thing certain—"the votes shall then be counted by him." But they did not so write. They changed the whole structure in the two members of the sentence. They command actively that he shall "open," and then say passively the votes shall be counted. The known rule of construction is expressio unius, exclusio alterius. The expression of one duty is the exclusion of any other duty. He shall open means he shall not count.

The learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Seelye] says it is monstrous to suppose that the framers of the Constitution should have placed this dangerous power to count the votes in the hands of a partisan House, instead of in the hands of one responsible man, the President of the Senate; that it is always safer to lodge such a partisan House, instead of in the hands of one responsible man, the President of the Senate; that it is always safer to lodge such power in one man's hands than in the hands of many. Every now and then, some politician, in the course of our history, has declared some power of the Constitution monstrous, and yet time and the people have made pure and refined the frightful monstrosity.

Montesquieu says the absolute government of one good man is far more beneficient than the government of many. But when that absolute ruler happens to be not good, then the one man is a tyrant. All along the page of history is found the rain caused by the rule of one man, and that man, too, a responsible man; for it is upon that word the learned professor dwells. Cromwell was responsible; Napoleon I and Napoleon III were both responsible to the people. No, sir, safety lies ever among the multitude; wisdom not always. Wisdom may lie often with one, but when that one happens to be bad, all is lost. Wells was master of the returning board in Louisiana. He was responsible to his State. Were his acts pure?

But, Mr. Speaker, where does the power lie? My own belief is that the framers of the Constitution left the manner of counting to the law-making power. They wisely left it with it. In the shifting changes of events, a constitution without any elasticity would be an utter obstruction. One manner of counting may be wise at one time, at another ruinous. It was the duty of the law-makers of the land to enact a law to carry into operation that member of this sentence which is the great hone of countention. "The notes shall then he which is the great hone of countention." The notes shall then he enact a law to carry into operation that member of this sentence which is the great bone of contention, "The votes shall then be counted." How? Why, as the Congress of the United States shall determine by law. Up till now Congress has made such law by joint resolution; resolution for the time being having the force of law. Up till now, the thing has worked so smoothly, that Congress has contented itself with temporary plans. Article 1, section 8, says Congress shall have power-

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

Now, sir, all through the Constitution are powers and mandates, which do not, cannot in themselves, be put into execution, but which laws do put into execution.
Article 1, section 11, says:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the States.

And section 4 say:

The time, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representa-tives, shall be proscribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, &c.

Now, suppose the Legislatures of States fail to make such prescription and Congress fells to make any law on the subject, what will be the result? Does any one, will any one, claim that the people of a dis-trict shall meet and choose their Representatives without such law? Surely not; and yet Government cannot be run without the House of Representatives.

Article 1, section 3, says:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, &c.

Suppose the Legislatures do not choose such Senators. Can they be chosen by the people of the States even if they should meet en masse on some grand plain? Surely not; and yet the States would be defrauded of their rights if they have not Senators. But gentlemen tell us that the people must have not Senators. But gentlemen tell us that the people must have the President of their choice or they will be defrauded. True. But then the people should see that they do through their representatives make the needful laws.

The Constitution says "the electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot," &c., for a President. But suppose the electors fail to meet in their respective States and vote, &c. 1 Does any one claim or can any one claim that the voice of the needle can be electors fail to meet in their respective States and vote, &c.? Does any one claim or can any one claim that the voice of the people can be heard or heeded except through their electors? Surely not; and yet if their electors fail so to meet and vote the people would be defrauded. Again, suppose the people of a State vote for certain electors with the expectation that such electors will vote for a certain man for President, and instead of voting for that man the electors should vote for some other man. Would not the people be defrauded? And yet the electors surely have the constitutional right to vote for whom they please, provided the man so voted for be not one of the prohibited persons. And if a majority of all the electors should conspire and vote for another than the one the people had in their minds when vote for another than the one the people had in their minds when they choose such electors, would not the man so elected be constitutionally elected? Yet the people would be defrauded.

But we are told that the Constitution is not an unmeaning instrument, and when it said the votes shall be counted it carried within itself the means for such count; and, as the two Houses may fail to agree, therefore, some hold, that the President of the Senate must do the counting; otherwise the whole mandate falls to the ground. And others say the two Houses may not agree, and therefore one House must have within itself the power to put the Constitution into effect, otherwise the mandate "the votes shall be counted" falls to the otherwise the mandate "the votes shall be counted" falls to the ground, and that could not be.

Now I do not assert positively, Mr. Speaker, but with the lights now before me I hold that the Constitution requires a law to put this clause into effect. And such law this bill is. If the whole thing rests with the two Houses without any law defining the mode, then I would rather conclude that the two Houses meet and vote per capita, and by analogy their vote should then be recorded as States, so as to carry out the idea of State autonomy. If there be no election for want of a majority of all the delegates appointed, then this House elects, voting by States. The electors are as many as the members of the two Houses, and if there be no law to fix the mode of counting, then the joint convention would carry out the spirit of the twelfth amendment by examining into the votes as a joint convention, and giving their votes as States. This I merely throw out. It has no bearing upon the question.

Let us look a little further into the Constitution and see whether my theory be not true, that the framers of the Constitution intended that a law should be made to enable the electoral vote to be counted.

Of course, I reason by analogy. Article I, section 7, says "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." Now, suppose the House fail so to originate bills? Is not this an obligatory mandate. Yet if it be not done the wheels of Government would be stopped. The bill could not originate itself, any more than the vote could count itself, and the executive department could not collect revenue without such bills.

Article 3, section 1, says:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and a such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. Now, if Congress fail to establish inferior courts, the people would be without justice. Yet the Supreme Court could not establish inferior courts of its own motion.

rior courts of its own motion.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have shown by analogy that the intention of the Constitution is that Congress shall determine by law how the electoral vote shall be counted. The bill now under consideration is such a law. It is not precisely the bill I would have framed or would approve if it were in my power to make and pass any other bill of a like nature. But the bill is before us. It is fair to all. It does not in itself do wrong to any. What may be the result of its working upon the aspirations of the two distinguished candidates for the Presidency I cannot tell. And that is, to my mind, its very best feature. It is in the interest of neither party. It constitutes a tribunal to weigh all the knotty questions surrounding and involved in bunal to weigh all the knotty questions surrounding and involved in the counting of the electoral votes.

The tribunal will be fair and honest. If I should think otherwise

I should say republicanism was a failure. If we cannot trust the five great jurists who will sit with the five members from this House and the five members from the Senate—men who will have the eyes of their fellow-citizens upon them, forty-five millions in number; men who will have the eyes of all the civilized world upon them; men who will have the eyes of untold millions yet unborn upon them; men whose acts will be weighed in historic scales, whose actions will go into the crucible of fiercest criticism-if we cannot trust these men, then let us be men ourselves, and let us, as men, bold and honest, declare that free republican government is an illusion, a snare, and a cheat. If we cannot trust these men so situated, acting under a solemn duty and under a sacred oath, let us say to America, "Wrap the drapery of thy mantle around thee and die as one who has had a glorious day, but whose day has come to an end."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in addressing the House for the few moments alloted me is to state the influences controlling my vote on the measures now before us.

I shall not undertake an elaborate argument of any of the intricate propositions involved in this controversy.

We find ourselves for the first time in the history of the country in that position in relation to the election of a President where the counting or not counting of a single vote determines the controversy one way or the other. Grave differences have arisen in the minds of our ablest statesmen, both in and out of Congress, as to what are the true votes of certain States. I am reminded by my party associates that this bill is a "surrender of Governor Hayes's case."

What do we surrender ! Let us see. We claim that Governor Hayes is entitled to 185 of the electoral votes. We make this claim honestly. Our opponents dispute it. There are in the custody of the President of the Senate duplicate returns from persons claiming to be electors in four States, namely: South Carolina, Florida, Louisiana, and Oregon. I assume that there is now no dispute as to Governor Hayes's title to the vote of South Carolina, and that all parties will agree to the count of the vote of this State for Hayes. Florida presents a different case. We claim it for Hayes, first, because the returning board of the State gave it to him, secondly, because the basis accepted by the court as the true returns which gave the State to Mr. Drew, the democratic candidate for governor, also gives a majority of the votes of that State to Hayes.

Our opponents claim the vote of Florida for Tilden on the assumption that a certain return from Baker County, in that State, is the true return, and if the order of the court had been fully obeyed this al-leged true return would have been counted, which, if counted, would have increased Drew's majority and given a majority for the Tilden electors. Both parties make charges and counter-charges of fraud. From all the evidence before me I believe the vote of the State of Florida fairly belongs to Hayes.

We next come to Louisiana. We find here that on the face of the returns the Tilden electors have a majority of something over 7,000

The law of the State created a returning board possessed of judicial as well as ministerial powers. To this board the returns of the election are sent from all the polling-places in the State. This board tion are sent from all the polling-places in the State. This board is charged with the important duty of trying and determining the question of fraud, intimidation of voters, violence, &c., at any of the polling-places; and if they find such to have existed from a certain specified date up to the day of election, their duty under the law is to throw out and not count such poll. In the discharge of their duty this returning board threw out and did not count the votes returned to them in certain polling-places in a number of the parishes of the State. By this action the majority of more than 7,000 votes, as shown for the Tilden electors on the face of the returns, was wiped out, and a majority of more than 3,000 votes was returned as the true vote of the State. the State.

Our opponents allege that this latter result could only have been obtained by the fraudulent action of the board, and but for this fraud the Tilden electors would have been found to be elected.

I have read with some care the testimony thus far taken and, while I do not believe the findings of the board are entitled to as much weight as a decision of the Supreme Court, as alleged by a committee of my party friends, I cannot escape the conclusion that intimidation of the most cruel and heartless character did exist at and prior to election day in November last, in at least six of the parishes. While I expect to find that in some cases outside of the six parishes polls were thrown out and not counted, on insufficient evidence, yet upon the whole I am prepared to believe that a fair adjudication of the returns justified the finding of the board. Our opponents honestly believe otherwise.

Then, lastly, we have the Oregon case. This State gave the Hayes electors a large majority. One of these electors, a Mr. Watts, being a postmaster, was ineligible under the Constitution to hold the office of elector. The governor of the State did what I believe he had no right to do when he declared that all the votes cast for Watts, the ineligible elector, were null and void, and by this mode of reasoning reached the conclusion that Cronin, the democratic elector who had the most votes, was elected. That fraud and corruption reaching up close to Mr. Tilden in connection with this Oregon swindle are clearly proven can hardly be disputed by any one who has taken the trouble to examine the testimony.

The governor issued his certificates of election to two republicans and to Cronin, the democrat, but took care to place all the certificates in the procession of Cronin.

in the possession of Cronin.

The law of Oregon, as well as most of the States, provides that, on the meeting of the electors, if it is found from any cause a vacancy or vacancies exist, the remaining electors fill such vacancy, and then proceed to cast their ballots for President and Vice-President. dent. The two republican electors met at the place by law designated, Mr. Cronin in the same room and having in his possession the two certificates of the republican electors and his own. He refused two certificates of the republican electors and his own. He refused to deliver up the certificates to the republicans. The two republicans then organized, filled the vacancy, and cast their vote for Hayes This vote was made out in triplicate and sent to their respective proper custodians, together with such evidence as they could command, establishing their right to cast the vote of the State of Oregon. Cronin at the same time, in the same room, organized himself into an electoral college, fills two vacancies, he and they together cast two votes for Hayes and one for Tilden. This vote was also made out in triplicate and sent to their respective custodians, accompanied with the certificate of the governor, as required by law. On the face of the returns, without knowledge of the fraud here practiced, the Cronin vote (two for Hayes and one for Tilden) would have to be Hayes is entitled to the three Oregon votes. We insist that the action of the governor was a fraud and tainted with corruption.

The governor and his friends claim that he acted in strict accordance with the law and his act in certifying to Cronin's election is in exact accord with the decisions of the supreme court of the State.

I have briefly stated the ground of difference between the contending forces here in regard to the electoral count in the four disputed

I believe that Hayes has received 185 electoral votes and is elected. Gentlemen on the other side honestly believe that Hayes is not entitled to the votes of Florida and Louisiana. Their belief, I concede,

How is this difference of opinion to be determined? The mass of republicans take the ground that the President of the Senate has the right under the Constitution to count the votes, meaning by this that he, and he alone, shall determine which is the true vote in each of the contested States. The democrats and many republicans deny that this power resides in the President of the Senate. They claim that the Houses must decide what are the true votes of the contested

In examining the question I find it has never been held that the President of the Senate under any and all circumstances can alone President of the Senate under any and all circumstances can alone execute the Constitution in respect of counting the electoral vote. It has always heretofore been held that the Houses by concurrent order had the right to determine how the vote should be counted. I apprehend that even now no one will question the right of the Houses to agree as to the mode and manner of counting. I am reminded that the President of the Senate for the first fifty years did count the vote. I think this will be found to be a mistake. The first count is generally regarded as a precedent in favor of the right of the President of the Senate to count. Yet it will be found that the Senate elected of the Senate to count. Yet it will be found that the Senate elected Mr. Langdon President of the Senate to count the electoral vote. If the Senate at the time believed the power to count resided in the President of the Senate why was he not elected President of the Senate simply? Why add the words to count the vote?

From this first count on down to the adoption of the twenty-second joint rule the two Houses agreed upon the mode and manner of joint rule the two Houses agreed upon the mode and manner of counting.

I do not propose to discuss this question any further than to say that to my mind the fact is established that no count has ever been made without the intervention and direction of one or both Houses. The President of the Senate has never even attempted to decide a contested question relating to the count. So far as the republican party is concerned, be its past action it is committed to the doctrine that the count can only be made by the Houses acting affirmatively on all questions of doubt. We passed the twenty-second joint rule; we have three times counted under its provisions. We have thrown out and refused to count the vote of States. Only a year ago a republican Senate passed a bill regulating the count and affirming the right of the Houses to count. the Houses to count.

Can we now as republicans ignore our past history, reverse all the precedents we have made, and claim the right of the President of the Senate to determine any and all questions relating to the validity of the votes placed in his custody and to determine and declare the re-

For myself, I confess to some doubt as to the real intent and mean opinion that the framers of the Constitution were adepts in the use of the English language, who gave to each clause of the Constitution words so clear as to leave no doubt as to its true meaning. Yet I may be pardoned for saying that in the case of this particular clause there is great obscurity. So much I confess as to excite in my mind grave doubts as to its true meaning. The votes must be counted; when opened, "they shall then be counted."

opened, "they shall then be counted."

I have no hesitation in saying that, in the absence of concurrent action by the Houses or of legislation, I believe the President of the Senate should take the responsibility, count the votes, and declare the result. While I say this, I hold that we are bound by the highest considerations of public policy to make an honest and determined effort to secure some constitutional method of counting that will give to the incoming President that best possible title that it is within our power to give

We have taken an oath to protect and defend the Constitution. We all believe we are not violating this oath, yet a portion of us believe the Constitution gives to the President of the Senate the right to count

Senate to count would be influenced if the Senate should to-day elect a strong democratic partisan in place of President Ferry. I fear my doubt as to the right of this officer to count would be increased, and that I should at once become greatly in favor of standing by the time-honored precedents made by my party. I perhaps would point to the bill passed by the Senate at its last session affirming the right of the Houses to supervise and control the count, for which nearly all my party friends voted, including President FERRY.

My purpose thus far has been to show that the landmarks on this question are too obscure to furnish a reliable guide to reach any certain conclusion.

Men of the highest standing in both parties differ as to the true meaning and intent of the Constitution.

We, as republicans, freely recognizing this fact and thoroughly believing in the justice of our claim to the Presidency, sought for a measure of escape from the embarrassments surrounding the count of the electoral vote.

The first House resolution looking to the adjustment of these embarrassments was offered by a republican. It received the unanimous support of the republicans here. The same is true of the Separa support of the republicans here. The same is true of the Senate. When the proposition came into the House and Senate proposing the appointment of the joint committee, it received the unanimous support of the republicans in both the House and Senate.

Now this joint committee, appointed by our unanimous assent, has, with one exception, presented unanimously a bill proposing the appointment of a joint commission of the two Houses and the Supreme Court, composed of equal numbers of each, to whom shall be referred all questions of law and of fact that may arise in the count of the electoral vote.

This bill is not such a one as I would suggest. I would much prefer the bill which I had the honor to present to this House, which proposed to submit to the Supreme Court the same questions of law and of fact that are submitted by this bill to the commission therein pro-

In matters of important legislation we never get just what each member believes to be the best proposition. All great measures are the result of the concession of individual views. In this case it is doubtless true that each individual member of the committee would have preferred a somewhat different result.

I accept and shall support the bill because I consider the mode of settling existing complications in relation to the electoral count a fair one. I will not by my voice or vote hesitate to declare my honest belief in the justice of my claim that Governor Hayes has been fairly opinion exists.

I am not influenced in my support of this measure because of democratic threats of violence. I take no stock in the ravings of my colleague, [Mr. Banning,] or the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WatTerson,] or other gentlemen who have been indulging in war-talk here and elsewhere. Barking dogs are not apt to fight. I can, however, see what seems to me will be the result of a failure to determine this question. If no action is had, the President of the Senate will count, as he is in duty bound to do. If he finds (as I think he ought) that Hayes has 185 votes and is elected, then I have no doubt that this House will declare that no person has been elected President and will proceed at once to the election of Mr. Tilden.

Certainly we must admit that such a complication as this is not pleasant to contemplate; nor can any man foresee the consequences. A blow struck, an attempt by force to establish Mr. Tilden's claim to the Presidency, may result in lighting the torch of civil war. A condition of things may result such as no patriot can contemplate without the deepest solicitude. The great business interests of the country are paralyzed. This paralysis is charged to the pending presidence. out the deepest solicitude. The great business interests of the contry are paralyzed. This paralysis is charged to the pending presidential complication. Its settlement is greatly desired by this great interest. For myself, I believe the business people of the country overestimate this as a cause of depression. Yet it must be admitted that it is the cause of more or less of the present stagnation in busi-

Gentlemen ought not to forget that to this great interest we are indebted for the proud position we now occupy as one of the nations of the earth. This interest builds your railroads, digs your canals, moves your mighty commerce, pays your revenues, and furnishes us with support. I repel in their name these insinuations. They will com-pare favorably in all that relates to genuine manhood or exalted pa-triotism with any other class of our fellow-citizens or even with us the Constitution gives to the President of the Senate the right to count the electoral vote and a larger number deny this right, and strangely, too, we are dividing on the question mainly by party lines, who doubts, Mr. Speaker, that if you occupied President Ferrey's place that the opinion of many gentlemen, who now affirm the right of the President of the Senate to count, would be greatly modified. How many gentlemen now denying this right would change their views and demand that you should count Tilden in.

The President of the Senate holds his place at the pleasure of the Senate. I have sometimes thought I would like to know how my own judgment on this question of the President of the Senate holds his place at the pleasure of the Senate. One-half of the people of this country believe that Hayes is elected and the other half just as sincerely believe Tilden is elected; by any other method than the one before us, whoever holds the place of President is, in the opinion of one-half of our people, an usurper. I support this measure because I believe it to be the highest duty

I support this measure because I believe it to be the highest duty of this Congress to give to the occupant of the presidential chair the best possible title that we can. This duty rises above all parties.

The highest and the best interests of the people demand that we do give the best possible title we can to the incoming Chief Magistrate.

I regret exceedingly my inability to agree with my colleagues of my party faith on this floor, as well as what now seems to be the expressed feeling of my party friends of my State, and more particularly in the district which I have the honor to represent. Under ordinary circumstances I should district my own indement when it ordinary circumstances I should distrust my own judgment when it stands against such an array of patriotism and intelligence, but in this emergency my notions of duty are so plain, my convictions so decided as to leave me no alternative but to antagonize their wishes. However much I regret it—and I do deeply regret it—I would hate myself if any influence could induce me to cast a vote that my judgment did not approve.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech on this question; but, sir, I have had forwarded to me a series of resolutions passed by democratic senators and representatives of the State of Indiana, and also a series of resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of the city of Indianapolis. I send these resolutions to the Clerk, to be read, in order that this House may know the partition that the series of the city of Indianapolis. the position that the democracy and the business men of Indiana oc-

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. Franklin Landers,

House of Representatives:

The following resolutions were offered by Hon. A. B. Carlton, and unanimously adopted by a joint convention of the democratic members of the senate and house in joint convention assembled:

"Resolved, That the democratic Representatives in Congress from the State of Indiana are hereby requested to support the bill which passed the Senate of the United States this morning, in relation to counting and determining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the secretary of this meeting immediately after the passage of resolution communicate the same by telegraph to Hon. Franklin Landers, to be by him laid before Congress."

CHAS. O. LEHMAN,

Secretary.

Office of the Indianapolis Board of Trade, Indianapolis, January 23, 1877.

At a fully attended meeting of the board of trade held this day the following was presented and adopted:

"Whereas the Board of Trade of Indianapolis, exclusively commercial in its organization, numbering among its members many of our leading citizens and business men, have viewed with solicitude the recent political complications of the country and felt their disastrous effect on her commerce;

"And whereas we rejoice at the result of the deliberations of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, and believe the plan reported by them to be the best available one for the solution of our presidential complications: Therefore.

Therefore,
"Resolved, That we approve of the provisions of the bill reported to Congress by said joint committee, and urge upon our Senators and Members of the House of Representatives a hearty support of the same."

R. S. FOSTER, President.

R. S. FOSTER, President. W. W. WILSON, Secretary.

W. W. WILSON, Secretary.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, those resolutions express my sentiments on this question, and it is unnecessary for me to say anything further. It is well known that I am in favor of the bill now under consideration. I regret the circumstances which have forced us into the present position, but under these circumstances I shall heartily support the bill and hope to see it passed by a large majority. Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Speaker, on the 7th of November last the people of the United States elected Rutherford B. Hayes President of the United States. I, for one, am not disposed to do any act to put in jeopardy that election. What is the difficulty that has grown up? It is said there is a controversy in South Carolina; but is there a man in the United States who doubts that on the 7th of November there were in that State 30,000 more voters who desired the election of Hayes than there were who desired the election of Tilden? election of Hayes than there were who desired the election of Tilden? There is a difficulty in Florida; but does any man doubt that on the 7th of November there were 4,000 more voters there who desired the election of Hayes than there were who desired the election of Tilden? It is said that there is a difficulty in Louisiana; but on the 7th of November there were 20,000 more voters in the State of Louisiana who desired the election of Hayes than there were who desired the election of Tilden.

These are the three States in regard to which we have heard so much. Now, shall these people be deprived of their rights, shall their undoubted wishes be defeated and disregarded? has been the question not only in this House, but in the States themselves. It was for the purpose of defeating their wishes that the shot-gun organizations did their work. It was for this purpose that the massacre of Hamburgh began upon the 6th or 7th of July last. It is for this purpose that all three of those States have been the scene of murder, of scourgings, of outrage, and of intimidation. Not merely have intimidation and outrage prevailed there, but intimidation has been attempted in this House from the day of its meeting down to the present day. [Laughter.] Sir, gentlemen talk about our being in a position resembling that of the British Parliament; but we have occupied during the last month and we now occupy the position of the French National Assembly of 1793. We have had our citizen Marat; and, France, he has gone down and harangued the sections, roused the Jacobins, and then come up to this House to see whether terror did not prevail and whether the Girondist minority dared to talk of right not prevail and whether the Girondist minority dared to talk of right and duty in the presence of the patroits of our northeastern gallery. Our citizen Marat has threatened this assembly with the overawing power of a hundred thousand unarmed democrats. [Laughter.] What, in Heaven's, name, would be the value of a hundred thousand democrats at the Capitol unless they were armed either with shotguns or with that other democratic weapon that does more hurt to him who holds it than to anybody else? [Laughter.]

There is one point in which our citizen Marat has failed to imitate his French prototype. When he comes here he is comely and gentle as a lamb. The French Marat sat in the National Assembly with a wet towel on his head; and, sir, I have wondered greatly from day to day to see that our distinguished citizen, the editor of a Kentucky Ami du peuple, had failed to equip himself in habiliments belonging properly to the rôle he has been playing. [Laughter.] He roars you to-day "gently as any sucking dove: as 'twere a nightingale." Yet men on this side of the House have not all of them failed to be affected. I heard yesterday, standing here on this floor, upon the Yet men on this side of the House have not all of them failed to be affected. I heard yesterday, standing here on this floor, upon the very spot I now occupy, a stalwart republican, weighing two hundred and thirty pounds, telling us that there was "great fear." I wish to say to the people of the country through you, sir, that there are a few republicans here on whom this "great fear" has not fallen.

But, sir, the question is not merely with reference to the three States which I have named. Some of our friends suppose that the presidential question is settled when we settle the condition of the vote of Louisiana, of South Carolina, and of Florida. Not a bit of it. This House, of whose acts I am bound to speak with respect, has found another great difficulty. Colorado is not a State. Every democratic press in the Union, including that managed by the gentleman from Kentucky, for weeks declared that Colorado had elected the democratic ticket, and thus secured three votes for the eminent citizen of Gramercy Parke [Laughter.] But by and by it turned out that the vote of Colorado was republican. All at once it was ascertained that Colorado had no vote; that Colorado was not a State, and when the Delegate from the Territory of Colorado retired to his own place at home this House refused to receive the Representative from the State of Colorado, and we have kept him here for two months, like State of Colorado, and we have kept him here for two months, like Mohammed's coffin, suspended between heaven and earth. [Laughter.] And I should like to know from the Judiciary Committee where in Heaven's name he is now. [Great laughter.]

But there is great light shed on this question, and on the high and patriotic motives which actuate the political majority of this House, patriotic motives which actuate the political majority of this House, from the great luminary of the Pacific coast—from Cronin's nose. [Great laughter.] The "great democratic party," the "great constitutional party," the "great strict-constructionist party," have had Cronin here to enlighten the people, and they found out that this light was fed with oil, not naphtha, but with oil that came from New York, furnished by a young man by the name of Pelton, nephew and private secretary of the eminent citizen in Gramercy Park. [Laugh-

In view of all this must there not be fighting? Is it not time for unarmed democrats to come here. Mark me, I speak of unarmed democrats. We were to have the 100,000 democrats come unarmed. But let confiding republicans take notice that morning, noon, and night the political majority of this House have been trying to drive away the seven hundred troops watching the Government arsenals at Washington. And to what end, Mr. Speaker, to what end? There are Government arms enough here to arm the whole of 100,000 democrats should they come here and be able to carry other arms than such as every truly constitutional democrat always bears about him. [Laughter.] This is the "great terror" which has threatened us, and this is what has "bull-dozed" a large number of members on my side of the House. [Laughter.]

Sir, the gentleman from Kentucky to-day told us that this country had yet to see a peaceful laying down of office by one party and the reception of office by the opposite party. The young gentleman will be older if he lives [laughter] and does not need too many wet towels on his head. I have lived even back to the days of Thomas Jefferson and John Adams, and I saw in 1841 the democratic party of that day, a great many of whom God made, [laughter,] give up their office like good citizens and consent to let the whig party who had been elected good citizens and consent to let the whig party who had been elected by the people take their places.

I, as a democrat, passed under the yoke, and we did not have any fighting then. In 1844 James K. Polk was elected. The whigs did not threaten to fight. Probably my young friend from Kentucky was but just born then. The democrats yielded gracefully in 1848 and the whigs went again into power. Did anybody hear of any fighting then? No! From 1848 to 1860 the democratic party had an unbroken lease of power, but in 1860 the people of this country said that they wanted a change; and, sir, at the risk of being charged with having said what was unkind, I say here, before the majority of this House, before God, and my country, that the democratic uprising in 1860 was simply because the democratic leaders were likely to lose the offices and the profits of the offices of the country, and for nothing else. for nothing else.

They failed, sir, as I hope every such an unholy uprising may fail. In 1877 we are brought face to face with a similar state of things. The republican party have elected Hayes. The democratic party want the offices. They are hungry. Their followers are hungry. This House, sir—I speak respectfully—was hungry on the 4th day of December, 1875, and they have only grown more and more hungry since. [Lauchter]

since. [Laughter.]
Sir, that is the origin of this great difficulty; that is what lies at the bottom of the great constitutional questions which are represented as formidable. That causes the trouble about who shall count the votes.

Why, sir, they say: "Mr. Townsend, would you intrust the power of counting the vote of the people to one man?" What does this intrust that power to one man? You have a tribunal of counting the vote of the people to one man?" What does this bill do but intrust that power to one man? You have a tribunal built up of five Senators, five Representatives, of whom five are republicans and five democrats, and two republican judges and two democratic judges, and here is the one man—the Colossus of Rhodes—to span the chasm, to stem the currents of strife. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, it is still the one-man power, and that power not exercised by the man to whom the Constitution intrusted it.

Now, sir, the friends of this measure having brought the Supreme Court in here, I shall not hesitate to talk about it. The man fixed Court in here, I shall not hesitate to talk about it. The man fixed Court in here, I shall not hesitate to talk about it. The man fixed upon, we have been told by our friends and told by our enemies, was Judge Davis, of Illinois. Our democratic friends wanted a fair count. They are the fairest set of men that God ever made or suffered to grow up, if God did not make them. [Laughter.] And they wanted to have not only a fair but an impartial count. But in order that the umpire might be perfectly fair and impartial, in order that every bias should be removed from the mind of the umpire, an order is forwarded from Gramercy Park to the democrats of Illinois that they should elect Judge Davis United States Senator. Not that there is any wrong in it; not the least in the world. It is done simply for the purpose of making Judge Davis unbiased. [Laughter.] And they want simple republicans to throw the power of the country into the hands of this judge that they have taken such pains to render unbiased.

Now, sir, I shall not vote for any such unbiased arrangement. But it turns out, after all, there is nothing in this bill about the question whether Colorado is a State, and I say to my friends on this side of the House through you, Mr. Speaker, that, if in God's providence this board of judges should decide everything that is to be submitted to them by this bill in your favor, the question of Colorado—and her three votes which were cast for Hayes and Wheeler are necessary to their election. their election-still remains undecided, and you have all the terrors of a struggle with our friends of the majority, the same as if this great compromise device had never been adopted. It reminds me of the story of the man who had very troublesome pigs. They were these great compromise device had never been adopted. It reminds me of the story of the man who had very troublesome pigs. They were these very long-nosed fellows which my friends from down South know about, that would root up the third row of potatoes growing on the opposite side of their pasture-fence. [Laughter.] He determined to have a fence built which would keep them safe in his own grounds; so he split rails from a tree so peculiarly crooked that when the pigs had crawled through the crooks of the rails they found themselves right back in the pasture again. [Laughter.] Now, I say to my friends who, in their anxiety to save the country, are ready to put themselves in the hands of their political enemies, that even if it should turn out that the dice was not loaded, that there was not some should turn out that the dice was not loaded, that there was not some-body on the other side that knew precisely what they were doing, you would still be left in the power of this House, that arrogates all you would still be left in the power of this House, that arrogates all power to itself, just where you started.

Now I want to improve the few minutes that I possess through the kindness of my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. Ballou] to say another thing. The whole power of this Government is being arrogated by this House. I am well enough satisfied with the law and the Constitution as interpreted by Langdon, by Washington, by Jefferson, by Adams, by Madison, and by Mouroe, without a dissent during their day. If any man wants a better Constitution or a better interpretation God speed to him. I am satisfied with the old way and shall tion, God speed to him. I am satisfied with the old way, and shall vote to adhere to the Constitution of our fathers as they understood vote to adhere to the Constitution of our fathers as they understood it, and as the men who made it understood it, as has just been shown by my friend from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.]

I will say one word more before closing. Gentlemen are constantly quoting here telegrams from merchants and telegrams from bankers. These men I have the highest respect for. They are a most important portion of our citizens. The great Master of mankind through his long mission never said a word against merchants as such, never said a word against bankers as such; but he found them one day in God's house making merchandise there and changing money for profit; and he "made a scourge of small cords" and scourged them from the temple. That is what the Master did. His disciples might be grieved if they should hear the rebukes which my friend from New York [Mr. Chittenden] and my friend from Massachusetts administered to persons the other day who manifested a spirit here similar to that evinced by the Master two thousand years ago. But notwithstanding that, I shall adhere in that respect, if no other, to the teachings of the great Teacher of mankind. [Applause.]

to the teachings of the great Teacher of mankind. [Applause.] Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present briefly some of the reasons why I shall vote in the negative on the pending proposition. It is an unfortunate fact that the Constitution, in many of its most essential provisions, is susceptible of different and conflicting interpretations. This is due, in my judgment, to the fact that the Constitution itself, in many respects, is a compromise upon some of the most vital questions that were before the people when that instrumost vital questions that were before the people when that instrument was framed. It is a compromise between State sovereignty upon the one hand and what may be called federalism on the other. It is a compromise between pro-slavery upon the one hand and antislavery upon the other. Whatever is agreed upon as the result of a compromise it necessarily follows that the language employed is ambiguous and uncertain. The reason for this is plain. Whenever there is a conflict of ideas upon any subject and a compromise is agreed upon as the result of a consultation, the document is usually so worded as to justify both parties in contending that it is susceptible worded as to justify both parties in contending that it is susceptible of a construction that will be in harmony with their views.

I am satisfied that the strongest advocates of the complete sovereignty of the several States are, as a rule, just as honest and sincere in their interpretation of the Constitution as the most enthusiastic advocates of what may be called the Hamiltonian school of federalists. It is no doubt true that the ambiguous and uncertain language that is used in the Constitution in describing the powers and duties of the President of the Senate and of the Congress in counting the elect-oral votes was the result of a conflict of ideas with regard to the limitations of power upon the Federal Government and that of the several States. The clause as finally agreed upon was no doubt the result of a consultation which satisfied both parties that the language used could be so construed as to conform to their particular ideas. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the safest rule of action that we can adopt is to ascertain as far as possible the intention of the framers of the Constitution and govern ourselves accordingly. Upon this point, however, I find that I am compelled to take issue with some gentlemen on this side of the House who have presented their views with a great deal of force and eloquence.

It is contended by some, for instance, that when the two Houses meet in joint convention that they are there simply as spectators, with no power or authority over the subject, and that the President of the Senate is to open the certificates, count the votes, and declare the result, and that his action is final. To this I certainly cannot give my assent. It seems to me that this would be a centralization give my assent. It seems to me that this would be a centralization and concentration of power in the hands of one man that was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. The two Houses do not, in my judgment, meet simply as spectators, but they are there as representatives of the people to see that the will of the people as expressed in the manner prescribed by law is carried out. It is clear to my mind that the framers of the Constitution intended that the Congress should have some supervisory power in counting the electoral votes, and that this power can be exercised whenever the electoral votes, and that this power can be exercised whenever the opportunity presents itself.

I shall endeavor to give as briefly as possible some of the grounds upon which this opinion is based. The honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in his very able and eloquent speech upon this subject a few days since, stated that there are five expressed or implied limitations upon the power of the States, and that if Congress has any authority whatever to interfere with the action of the States in the appointment of electors, that authority must be found in some one or more of the five limitations. And these limitations in brief are, first, that it must be a State that elects the electors; second, no State can have more electors than the number of Senators ond, no State can have more electors than the number of Senators and Representatives to which it is entitled in Congress; third, no one can be an elector who is ineligible under the Constitution; fourth, Congress can fix the day when the States shall vote for electors; fifth, Congress can fix the day when the electors shall give their votes. My friend from Ohio will pardon me for expressing it as my opinion that this is not a reasonable construction of the Constitution with regard to the limitations of power between the Enderal Covernment and that of the several States upon this subject Federal Government and that of the several States upon this subject. I agree with him that the constitutional power of Congress over this subject is not unlimited, and it may be that the framers of the Constitution intended that the Congress should be confined to the limitations referred to by him whenever the fundamental principles of republican government have not been violated by the action of a State. But to hold that the action of the State is final, subject only to the five limitations or exceptions referred to, would have the effect of depriving the Federal Government of all power to uphold, preserve, and maintain its national existence. The sovereignty of the Federal Union would become practically subordinate to the sovereignty of the several States.

The Constitution of the United States declares that the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, &c.; and, further:

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treatics made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

If it is made the duty of the United States to guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, does it not necessarily follow that the United States is to be the judge as to what constitutes a republican form of government? And do not the five limitations of power referred to by the gentleman from Ohio have the effect of depriving the Federal Government of the power to pass upon such a question, even when our national existence as a people is involved? It seems clear to me that this is the logical deduction to be drawn from the argument.

The fifteenth amendment to the Constitution declares that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," and that "the Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." Let us sup-pose (and the supposition is by no means an unreasonable one) that a State Legislature, in providing for the appointment of electors, should declare that none but white citizens shall participate in such election. Would this action on the part of the Legislature be in violation of any one of the five conditions or limitations referred to by the gentleman from Ohio? I think not. I take it for granted that there would be no question as to the State being a State in the Federal Union. The number of electors chosen will not be in excess of the number of Senators and Representatives to which the State is entitled in the national congress. There will be no question as to the qualification of the electors. They will have been chosen on the day prescribed by law for that purpose, and they will cast their votes in the manner prescribed by law, and on the day appointed by law for that purpose. Will not the five conditions have been complied with and at the same time the last amendment to the Constitution ignored and completely disregarded?

It may be said that in that event the representation in Congress would be reduced in proportion to the whole number of citizens thus would be reduced in proportion to the whole number of citizens thus disfranchised. True, this may be done at the next succeeding apportionment of Representatives, but not before; for if the Federal Government has no power under the Constitution to enforce the provisions of the fifteenth amendment in the election of presidential electors, then it has no power to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment relative to the reduction of representation in Congress and in the electoral college in consequence of such disfranchisement. It is clear to my mind that, when a State shall have violated the fundamental principles and conditions of republican government in choosing its electors, and the United States Government through its legislative department has ample power to inquire into the validity of such an election, and if necessary set it aside.

Let us now inquire as to the limitations of this power. No one, I presume, will contend that the powers and duties of Congress in this presume, will contend that the powers and duties of Congress in this presume, will contend that the powers and duties of Congress in this respect are unlimited, for the several States have certain powers conferred upon them by the Constitution which are entirely independent of the General Government or any department thereof. It is claimed by some that the vote of no State can be counted unless both Houses of Congress will agree to the same. This position seems to me to be both unreasonable and unsound. To say that the vote of no State can be counted unless both Houses of Congress will so decide will have the effect of completely destroying the independent functions of the sevcral States. It would be a centralization of power, not in the Federal Government, not in the Congress of the United States, but in either House thereof. It would then be in the power of a party majority in either House of Congress to prevent an election of President by the people. It seems to me that no one who has the slighest conception of the proper constitutional limitations of power between the General Government and the several States can for a moment assert that the Constitution, as ambiguous and uncertain as it is in this respect, is susceptible of such a dangerous construction. Moreover, the rule is susceptible of such a dangerous construction. Moreover, the rule of evidence in that case would be at war with every principle upon that subject that is known to our English and American jurisprudence. For the presumption would be that every State, in casting its electoral votes, will have done so in violation of law. The burden of proof in such a case would rest with the party objected to, and not with the party making the objection. I certainly cannot give my assent to such a proposition.

What then are the rowers and duties that the framers of the what the party hards to object. Tectatally called give my assent to such a proposition.

What then are the powers and duties that the framers of the Constitution intended to confer upon the Congress in this respect? It is clear to my mind that, when the electoral votes of a State shall have been cast according to the forms of law, they then present a prima facie case. They are presumed to be lawful, and must stand until they are set aside or rejected by competent authority. The certificates having been opened by the President of the Senate, my opinion is that it is competent for any member of either House to enter an objection to the counting of the electoral votes of any State. But, the votes having been cast according to the forms of law, they present a prima facie case, and the burden of proof therefore rests with the objecting party; and unless the objection is sustained by both Houses the votes must be counted. To make my position upon this point clearer I will make this illustration: Should I be permitted to do so, I, as a member of the present Congress, will be certain to enter my solemn protest against counting the electoral votes of the State of Mississippi, because the election was carried by fraud and State of Mississippi, because the election was carried by fraud and violence and therefore the result does not reflect the sentiments of a majority of the voters of that State. But the votes have been cast according to the forms of law, and they are presumed to be correct. Unless, therefore, the objection is sustained by both Houses of Congress, the votes must be counted. But the next and most important question involved is in cases where there are two or more sets of returns from the same State.

It is true that the President of the Senate, in his ministerial capacity as custodian of the returns, has no power to inquire into the legality of the election or the qualification of electors. In fact he has no power whatever conferred upon him, either in expressed terms or by necessary implication, to pass upon any question affecting the legality of the election or the qualification of electors. Still, it seems to me that some discretion was intended to be conferred upon the to me that some discretion was intended to be conferred upon the-President of the Senate as to what are the returns of a State, subject, of course, to the action of Congress. This interpretation of the Con-stitution with regard to the powers and duties of the President of the Senate is not only reasonable and necessary, but is absolutely essential to prevent inextricable confusion. It is made the duty of the Clerk of the House of Representatives to place upon the rolls of the House the name of every Congressman-elect who presents creden-tials signed by the governor or the person or persons authorized by the laws of the several States to certify to the election of officers. He, like the President of the Senate has no right to inquire into or pass the laws of the several States to certify to the election of officers. He, like the President of the Senate, has no right to inquire into or passupon the legality of the election or the qualification of electors. Hisduties in that respect are simply ministerial. But, when two or more persons present credentials, claiming to be the member-elect from the same district and the credentials signed by different persons, all claiming to be authorized by law to discharge that duty, the Clerk must exercise some discretion as to what names shall go upon the rolls, subject to the action of the House, and his decision stands and is legal and valid until the same shall be reversed by the House.

and valid until the same shall be reversed by the House.

The President of the Senate having presented to the joint convention what he considers to be the returns of the several States, they thus present the prima facie case and must be regarded as the lawful returns until his decision shall be reversed by the concurrent action of both Houses.

To make my position upon this point clearer, I will suppose that the President of the Senate will, in February next, lay before the joint convention the certificates from the State of Louisiana, signed by John McEnery, claiming to be the governor of that State, as the certificates of that State. This action on his part would give the certificates thus presented the prima facie case and they would stand as the votes of that State unless objection be made thereto and the objection sustained by both Houses of Congress. This is great power, I admit, but it is not plenary; it is subject to revision and reversal. The rights and liberties of the people are, presumptively at least, protected by their immediate representatives.

I shall not enter into a detailed explanation of the pending bill, as that has already been done by other gentlemen in a very elaborate manner. It is sufficient for me to say that I shall vote in the negative solely upon constitutional grounds. This is to my mind a politi-manner. It is sufficient for me to say that I shall vote in the negative solely upon constitutional grounds. This is to my mind a political, and not a judicial, question.

Even if it should be conceded that Congress can by legislation confer upon a different tribunal than that prescribed by the Constitution for the settlement of this question the power which is contemplated being conferred upon this proposed tribunal, the composition of the tribunal opens it to serious constitutional objections.

The bill provides that this proposed tribunal shall be composed of a portion of two of the independent departments of the Federal Government. This, I believe, to be in violation of the spirit of the Constitution. The framers of the Constitution were particularly anxious to keep separate and distinct from each other the independent departments of the Federal Government.

I earnestly hope that the highest anticipations of those who advocate this bill may be fully realized and that the country may be saved from the consequences of a disagreement between the two Houses of Congress. It is to be hoped that the decision of this tribunal, if created, will give general satisfaction and that the people of all parties and sections will willingly acquiesce in the decision. I do not oppose the passage of the pending bill from a stand-point of equity. I am, as a republican, perfectly willing that the rights of the candidates of my choice should be submitted to the decision of a fair and impartial tribunal, and I would cheerfully give my vote for this bill if I could be induced to be believe that it is warranted by the Consti impartial tribunal, and I would cheerfully give my vote for this bill if I could be induced to believe that it is warranted by the Constitution. I am apprehensive that the passage of this bill will establish a precedent which will be more dangerous in the future and will be more injurious in its application than the temporary evils which it is intended to remedy.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I cannot flatter myself that anything I may say will alter the predetermination of any gentleman in relation to the pending measure, nor do I ask the indulgence of the House at this time with any such hope. I simply desire to state as briefly as I can some of the reasons why I cannot vote for the bill under consideration. I have indulged in no speculation, sir, as to what will be the probable result of the deliberations of the commission proposed to be organized, nor as to ultimate consequences of any action which that tribunal may see proper to take, should it be established. Should the bill pass, I take it for granted that every member of the commission, acting under the solemn sanction of an oath, will declare his mission, acting under the solemn sanction of an oath, will declare his honest judgment upon every question which may be submitted to him as such, according to the dictates of a conscience enlightened as far as possible by a calm and dispassionate examination of the law and the facts which such question may involve. If they should not, the day that dawns upon their organization will be a sad and memorable one in American history, especially to those who to-day give their assent to this measure.

Without anticipating any such questions at this time, however, I am one of those who entertain the opinion that there is nothing involved in the recent election of President and Vice-President which demands or even justifies anything like a compromise, even if this Congress were authorized to make it. The American people, on the 7th of November last, through the quiet and peaceful methods of the Constitution, expressed their choice for those high offices by a majority of over two hundred and sixty thousand, and the electors selected by their untrammeled suffrage met within their respective States on the day prescribed by law and cast their votes, leaving to us, sir, the simple duty of determining and declaring the result under the obligation of the oaths we have taken, regardless of whatever consequences may ensue; and while I have no possible criticism to make upon the conduct of any other gentleman, I repeat what I recently had eccasion to say on this floor, that if I should hesitate to discharge that duty as I have the capacity to understand it, I would regard mythat duty as I have the capacity to understand it, I would regard my-self as a traitor and a coward, deserving the execration, the obloquy, and contempt of the generous and confiding constituency who sent

But, sir, conceding for the sake of the argument that the exigency demanded a compromise, have we the constitutional authority to make it? That is the great question upon which I have most anxiously desired to be enlightened by the distinguished gentlemen who have so earnestly and eloquently advocated the passage of this bill. Have we the power under the Constitution to create any such tribunal as it contemplates for the purposes proposed? If we have not, there the discussion should end, no matter how fair or how expedient the proposition may apparently be. In questioning that power, sir, in opposition to the learning, the eloquence, and the pathos of distinguished gentlemen who have spoken upon this question here and in the Senate, I cannot appropriately express the diffidence with which I am embarrassed. I recognize their superior intellectual astuteness; I bow in humble deference to their more extended research, and I fully appreciate the insignificance of my own poor powers of reason-I bow in humble deference to their more extended research, and I fully appreciate the insignificance of my own poor powers of reasoning when compared with their profound and splendid abilities. Yet, sir, I cannot forget that while the eagle alone may soar above the clouds and gaze with undazzled vision upon the full-orbed splendor of the meridian sun, even the humble hedge-sparrow is able to appreciate something of its noontide effulgence. I trust, therefore, that, humble as I am it may not be considered pressurements in me to ask preciate something of its noontide effulgence. I trust, therefore, that, humble as I am, it may not be considered presumptuous in me to ask that this bill may be examined in the broad light of the Constitution.

Now, sir, it will be admitted by every gentleman on this side of the House at least, as was the theory and practice of the republican party until the present exgiency arose, in which they see that power is gone from their grasp unless they shall be able to retain it either by the strong hand of force or through some new and strange method of executive the recent presidential destination that the recent presidential states in the them. cuting the recent presidential election, that the power to decide what are valid and what are invalid as electoral votes for President and Vice-President is vested by the Constitution of the United States in the Senate and House of Representatives. However much dispute or difference of opinion there may be as to the manner in which that power has every be every larger whether concurrently, whether in joint assembly, ference of opinion there may be as to the manner in which that power may be exercised, whether concurrently, whether in joint assembly, or by each House separately, and upon its own conscience enlightened as its own judgment may dictate, there is no controversy among us that the power is vested in the two Houses; and if the power is delegated to the Senate and House of Representatives, it carries with it the correlative duty of exercising it whenever occasion requires, and we cannot neglect or evade the performance of that duty without a violation of our constitutional oaths. If this principle is correct, sir, and I imagine but few will be found with sufficient temerity to question it, permit me to ask the learned constitutional lawyers around me, the latchets of whose shoes even I am unworthy to loose, where they find the authority to delegate that power, or transfer the discharge of that duty to any other tribunal whatever? Not one of them will deny that when a power is delegated to a particular person or body of men it can be delegated by them to no other person on the earth, unless the person to whom it is delegated have express authority to delegate its performance to some one else. No lawyer who thority to delegate its performance to some one else. No lawyer who pretends to the least familiarity with even the horn-books of the profession will question the correctness of this principle, even when applied to the most unimportant transactions between man and man; but, sir, it applies with ten thousand times more force to those great constitutional powers, coupled with the gravest trust that could be committed to a human agency, delegated by the people of a great family of republics to the Senate and House of Representatives in family of republics to the Senate and House of Representatives in the carefully guarded terms of a written Constitution. Where, then, I repeat, sir, is the power to delegate the authority to examine, verify, and pass upon the validity of an electoral vote to any other tribunal whatever expressly (or even impliedly—if such a thing were possible) conferred upon Congress by the Constitution? Sir, this question has not been, and never can be answered, because the authority to delegate their powers has never been conferred upon the Senate and House of Representatives, and could not be without a total subversion and an utter destruction of our system of government. Once concede that they may do so in any given instance, and they may if they choose transfer the whole of their powers to an organization of which the framers of the Constitution or the people never dreamed. never dreamed.

On the other hand, concede for a moment that the sole power of counting the votes, and consequently of determining what votes are to be counted, is vested by the Constitution in the President of the Senate, where has Congress the authority to strip him of that consti-tutional power, to hinder him in its exercise or excuse him from its performance? Will some of the advocates of this, which is to my mind the most absurd of all hypotheses—and I say it with all possible respect for their intelligence—please answer me that?

It may be answered, sir, as several gentlemen have already asserted, that the authority to create the tribunal contemplated by this bill is found in the eighteenth clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which provides that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers"—that is, of laying and collecting taxes, borrowing money, regulating commerce, coining money, &c.—"and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof." What, sir! is it possible that the authority to pass a law which will aid a department or officer of the Government in the execution of a vested power may be so construed as to take away the cution of a vested power may be so construed as to take away the power altogether and transfer it to another? Is that sound constitutional construction? Then Congress, under pretext of aiding the President in carrying into execution his powers as Commander-in-Chief President in carrying into execution his powers as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, may strip him of that command entirely and transfer it to a joint high commission of fifteen, composed of five members from each House and five "grave and reverend seigniors" from the Supreme Bench. Sir, I would not linger upon this singular assumption, even if I had the time, for I am persuaded that the learned gentlemen who have assumed that position did so inadvertently, or at any rate without properly considering to what remarkable absurdities it would inevitably lead them. But, sir, conceding, for the sake of the argument, that it is competent for the Congress to transfer any of its functions with regard to the electoral vote to another tribunal, and that it may constitutionally create a tribunal for that purpose, let us see whether the bill under consideration is in conformity to the Constitution in other respects. Constitution in other respects.

The second section provides that, if more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, all such returns or papers shall be opened by him in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives and read by the tellers, and all such returns and papers shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision, as to which is the true and lawful electoral vote of such State, of a "commission" constituted and lawful electoral vote of such State, of a "commission" constituted as follows: Each House shall by vira voce vote appoint five of its members, who, with five associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be ascertained as thereinafter provided, shall constitute a "commission" for the decision of all questions upon or in respect of such double returns; and that the members of such commission shall respectively take an oath therein prescribed; that it shall not be in the power of either House to dissolve the same or withdraw any of its members, and that when any question upon which the commission is authorized to act shall arise the same shall which the commission is authorized to act shall arise the same shall be forthwith submitted to the commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and by a majority vote decide whether any and what votes from such State are votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing law be competent and pertinent in such consideration; while the seventh section provides that the commission shall make its own rules, keep a record of its proceedings, and shall have power to employ such persons as of its proceedings, and shall have power to employ such persons as may be necessary for the transaction of its business and the execution of its powers.

Now, sir, it will be observed that this proposed tribunal is not to be Now, sir, it will be observed that this proposed tribunal is not to be a committee of either House, nor a joint committee of both. It is not the mere organ of either the Senate or the House, nor the joint agent of both, subject to the supervision and withdrawal of either. On the contrary, it is carefully designated throughout the bill as a "commission," and it is expressly provided that when once organized its existence is irrevocable and its functions beyond the control of either House; and, moreover, that whatever its decision may be it cannot be overruled except by the concurrent voice of the two branches of Congress. In a word sir it cannot be decided with any pretext of deceney In a word, sir, it cannot be denied with any pretext of decency gress. In a word, sir, it cannot be defined with any pretext of decency that, so far as the discharge of its functions is concerned, it is a separate, distinct, independent organism, whose determination can only be annulled by a concurrent vote of both Houses of Congress, which, to be effectual, must have the approval of the President of the United States or be carried by a two-thirds majority in each; for, if gentlemen will turn to the third clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, they will find that—

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Hence if the President should concur in the decision of the comnence it the President should concer in the decision of the commission, it stands forever beyond the control or supervision of any power on earth save a two-thirds majority of each House, however erroneous or arbitrary or unjust such decision may be.

Now, sir, what is this commission, and what are these proposed commissioners to be? Mr. Webster defines the word "commission" as used in this bill to be "a number of persons joined in an office or trust," and the same distinguished lexicographer defines an office to be "a particular duty, charge, or trust, conferred by public authority, and for a public purpose; an employment undertaken by commission or authority from the government or those who administer it." These definitions, sir, are not only according to the ordinary understanding, but are in strict conformity to judicial decisions, which have fixed the legal signification of those terms, as every intelligent lawyer will bear me out in asserting.

Again, sir, the same authority, with like conformity to common parlance and legal definition, defines an officer to be "a person commissioned or authorized to perform any public duty." Now, bearing in mind, sir, what I said a few moments ago, that this proposed tribunal is in no sense a committee of either House, nor a joint committee of both, but a distinct organism, with specified powers and duties created by law in which both the legislative and executive departments of the Government must concur, permit me to repeat the inquiry, What is this commission but an office, and what are these commissioners to be but officers? What lawyer with a decent regard for his legal reputation can contend that they are not to be officers, sir, to all intents and purposes? Then, if it be admitted that they are to be officers, which they must be, or the settled meaning of that word must be totally disregarded, let me ask gentlemen to turn to the second clause of the second section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States, and tell me where we get any more authority to appoint these officers than the Queen of England has. That clause provides that— That clause provides that-shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appointembassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law.

It is proposed to establish this office by law, and I would be glad to be informed where the Senate and House of Representatives get the authority to strip the President of the power of appointment in order that they may fill it themselves.

But this is not all, sir. The second clause of the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution provides that—

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office

Now, sir, in view of this provision, do you not think that this Honse will be somewhat puzzled to find five eligible candidates for this high and responsible office which it is now proposed to create? Let our Committee of Elections be set to work instantly, and if they can find five gentlemen who have not been elected to the seats they occupy on this floor, we may have five candidates for whom we can vote without violating this provision of the Constitution. But, sir, are you not somewhat apprehensive that the gentlemen themselves might have some hesitation about accepting the honor, inasmuch as it would work a forfeiture of their seats as Representatives, if the last sentence in the clause I have just read has any more meaning than a blank piece of paper? Let me repeat it, sir:

And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one other objection to this bill, which, to my mind, is absolutely insuperable, and that is the provision in the first section that-

No electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been made shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses.

In no possible sense can that provision be correct. If an electoral of both Houses combined to reject it even by an affirmitive vote. Such a proceeding would be not only unconstitutional, but absolutely revolutionary. On the contrary, if a thing purporting to be an electoral vote is really from any cause invalid as such, it would be equally subversive of the Constitution to count it, and the enormity of such a proceeding would be immeasurably enhanced if the House should thereby assume to control the conscience of the Senate in respect to thereby assume to control the conscience of the Senate in respect to the exercise of its ultimate power to elect a Vice-President, or the Senate should thus hinder or defeat the House in the exercise of its constitutional right to elect a President, or to judge for itself when the contingency had arisen for the performance of that duty.

Finally, sir, the great question underlying this whole subject is whether an election of President and Vice-President which has been constitutionally made shall be constitutionally declared and enforced, constitutionally made shall be constitutionally declared and enforced, or whether after the people have peacefully and legally expressed their choice at the polls, the result must after all be left to the arbitrament of a tribunal utterly unknown to the Constitution, and which cannot be called into existence without a plain and palpable violation of many of the essential provisions of that instrument. Fears have been expressed of a dual Presidency and consequent civil war. How that might be I do not pretend to be able to predict, though I have, I confess, no apprehensions of anything of the kind. As for myself, I have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, the very essence of which is that I shall faithfully and fearlessly do my constitutional duty as I understand it, leaving the result to God and the people. With these views, sir, whatever may be the consequences, I feel impelled to vote against this bill, deeply as I regret being compelled to dissent from the opinions and as difficult as it is for me to resist the pathos of the distinguished gentlemen who support it.

Mr. CARR. Mr. Speaker, the subject presented by this bill for our consideration is fraught with an importance which has never been so vividly realized as now. Heretofore in the political history of our country the results of never leaving a leatings have been so decidedly and country the results of popular elections have been so decidedly and decisively for one or the other of the opposing candidates, that the power of Congress in canvassing the result has been more a matter of form than a necessity, and being such only, the manner and extent of exercising it has been comparatively of minor importance, and therefore the destablished the results are such as the confidence of th fore the adaptability of the machinery provided by our fathers for this purpose has never been fully tested and its inadequacy discovered. At this time, when the votes of undisputed States leave the opposing candidates for the presidential office so nearly equal and each so close to an election, with a disputed and undisposed of voteyet to be counted sufficient to elect either—under circumstances, where a conflict of State authorities or local claims renders a Federal adjudication of the matter absolutely indispensable, and when that decision shall determine the supremacy, perhaps the future existence, of one of the two great political parties into which the people are divided, we come to examine the constitutional machinery in detail, it is found to be inadequate or imperfectly understood. This is not a new discovery, but one that has long been known. Even as early as 1793, the first year after the adoption of that instrument, it was thought the Constitution provided expressly no mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President, and to provide for this deficiency the following resolution was adopted by the House:

Resolved. That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining votes for President and Vice-President, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected of their

In which resolution the Senate concurred and the committee was appointed. At each subsequent presidential election the same provision was made. Mr. Barbour at one time gave notice that he would at some future time propose a law providing a permanent mode of discharging this important function; but as at no subsequent period this deficiency assumed vital importance, he never carried his determination into successful action. In the year 1800 a bill was introduced and passed the Senate which aimed at the establishment of riod this deficiency assumed vital importance, he never carried his determination into successful action. In the year 1800 a bill was introduced and passed the Senate which aimed at the establishment of a mode which should exist as a permanent law, but this effort failed in the House and never became a law. So, while the subject before us to-day is not a new one, and though this is not the first consideration which it has received in the halls of Congress, yet we are now called upon to consider it under new complications, which press upon us an immediate decisive action, which we cannot avoid if we would. Under the wise provision of our system of government, which returns to the people at stated periods all authority and the power to designate by the ballot their public servants and the policy which shall prevail in the administration of their governmental affairs, the people have met at the polls, discharged that highest and most sacred duty, and expressed their determination. But by a system of fraud this determination of the people is covered with clouds of uncertainties, by which it is hoped by the conspirators and feared by the honest masses that the people are to be robbed of their choice of chief executive and the line of policy which shall govern them in the future. They see in this attempt an attack upon the citadel of their liberties, in the success of which will be destroyed the sacredness of the ballot-box—the safety of our free institutions, the stability of our government. They feel, justly feel, that under such increasing schemes of professional tricksters every feature which has rendered this Republic the source of their protection and the object of their pride is rapidly drifting away, and nothing but the integrity of their Representatives or their own strong arms can snatch from the terrible vortex into which it is now plunging that enterprise of self-government begun in the prayers and established in the blood of our fathers. In this extremity they call upon us, and we are required to exercis electoral vote?

HAS CONGRESS THE POWER ?

The present constitutional provision on this subject was adopted in 1804, and almost continuously since that time there have been those of our citizens who have maintained the position that Congress did not possess such powers, and among these were some few whose learning, experience, and position entitle their opinions to more than arbitrary confutation. Of such were Randolph of Virginia and Pinckney of South Carolina. In 1821 Mr. Randolph took the ground Pinckney of South Carolina. In 1821 Mr. Randolph took the ground that the States respectively, and not Congress, had the power of determining how the vote should be cast for President and Vice-President; but this view was the result of that gentleman's extreme views upon the then growing doctrine of State rights; and he advanced the proposition as an abstract principle, which as such cannot be denied as correct; but Mr. Randolph never went so far as to say that, in case where there was a conflict of State authority and opposing votes had been returned, Congress had no judicial power to determine for itself the genuine from the false vote. So, when in 1865 Mr. Doolittle in the Senate took the ground that Congress had no power to reject the vote of certain States, it would not be a legitimate conclusion from his argument to say that he denied the right of Congress to determine between conflicting votes from the same State. Mr. Pincksion from his argument to say that he denied the right of Congress to determine between conflicting votes from the same State. Mr. Pinckney at no time expressed himself as denying the right of Congress to adjudicate between two apparent claims, and he simply avoided this question by asserting that such an emergency would never arise. His views were that Congress should have as little power as possible in determining the result of a presidential election; but it can nowhere be found where he or any other State-rights man has ever expressly denied Congress the power and right of so conducting the canvass of electoral votes as to give the true force and effect to the will of the people of each State as expressed at the ballot-box.

While the many debates and votes recorded of Congress have dis-

While the many debates and votes recorded of Congress have disclosed the names of but very few fathers who have questioned the exclosed the names of but very few fathers who have questioned the extent of the power of Congress over this subject, the names of those who have at all times maintained the right of Congress to exercise a supervisory power over the electoral vote are many and distinguished. Among them stand conspicuously Jefferson, Barbour, Macon, Clay, Archer of Maryland, Livermore, Webster, Grundy, Wright, Bigler, Trumbull, Washburn, Douglas, Cass, Crittenden, Lincoln, Edmunds, Sherman, B. F. Butler, Hoar, Morrox, and others.

Mr. Jefferson is not reported in the annals of Congress as having expressed himself upon this subject, but all his private correspondence plainly indicate that he so construed the Constitution as to give Congress this power; and in 1805, as President of the Senate, in counting gress this power; and in 1805, as President of the Senate, in counting the vote, he said:

You will now proceed, gentlemen, to count the votes as the Constitution and ws direct.

Mr. Barbour, in 1821, plainly declared Congress to have the power of counting or rejecting the electoral vote of States, by reporting, as chairman of a joint committee, the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall meet in the House, at twelve m., on Wednesday next, and the President of the Senate shall preside; that one person shall be appointed teller on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote.

Resolved, If any objection be made to the vote of Missouri, and the counting or not counting of which shall not change the result of the election, in that case it shall be reported by the President of the Senate as follows: "If the vote of Missouri be counted the result would be, for A B — votes; if not counted, for A B — votes; but in either case A B is elected."

Mr. Macon recognized this right of Congress by accepting the position of teller to count the electoral vote on two different occasions, the last one being in the year 1817, when he not only acted as such but also reported the joint rule giving the power to Congress; and this, too, when Congress assumed the right of objecting to the counting of the State of Indiana.

Mr. Clay took part in the deliberations of Congress in disposing of the vote of Missouri in 1821, thereby recognizing this power to reside in that body; while in 1837 he was a member of the committee on the part of the Senate to report "a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President" and "to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any votes were given at the recent election contrary to the prohibitions contained in the second section of the second article of the Constitution, and if any such votes were given, what article of the Constitution, and if any such votes were given, what ought to be done with them;" and which committee exercised the right to make such inquiry, and reported back to Congress that "this provision of the Constitution, it is believed, excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors, and the disqualifications relates back to the time of the appointment, and that a resignation of the office of deputy postmaster after his appointment as such elector would not entitle him to vote as elector under the Constitution." Constitution."

In 1820, Mr. Clay said:

The Constitution required of the two Houses to assemble and perform the highest duty that could devolve on a public body: to ascertain who had been elected by the people to administer their national concerns. In case of votes coming forward which could not be counted the Constitution was silent, but fortunately the end in that case carried with it the means. The two Houses were called in to enmerate the votes for President and Vice-President. Of course they were called on to decide what are votes.

Mr. Archer, of Maryland, in 1821, said:

I am not a little surprised at the ground taken by some gentlemen, that the House of Representatives had no power to pass judgment on the returns. I am now and always have been of the same opinion, that, wherever was lodged a power to receive a power, there also was the power to pass a judgment on the validity of the returns.

In 1821, Mr. Livermore, of New Hampshire, objected to counting the vote of Missouri, on the ground that it was not a State of the Union; by which it is evident he held that power to be vested in

Daniel Webster, who justly earned and deserved the title of "the constitutional expounder," was a member of the joint committee to report a mode of counting the electoral vote in 1829, and the joint rule contained this significant expression:

If it shall appear that a choice has been made agreeably to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Grundy was several times a member of the joint committee

Mr. Grundy was several times a member of the joint committee between the two Houses to report a joint rule for counting the vote, and made the report in person in 1837, wherein the committee entered quite extensively into the eligibility of several electoral votes.

Silas Wright and Bigler always recognized this power in Congress, and repeatedly acted as tellers to do the counting, and upon joint committees to report a rule for that purpose; Mr. Bigler making a report as teller in 1857 omitting the votes of Wisconsin pursuant to a resolution of the two Houses.

Our later-day statesmen have been no less explicit in their recognition of this power. Mr. Trumbull and E. B. Washburne were of the joint committee who reported the celebrated twenty-second joint rule in 1865, wherein this power of Congress was not only affirmed, but the manner in which it should be exercised was pointed out.

On the 10th day of February, of the same year, Mr. Lincoln sent a message to the two Houses of Congress in explanation of his signing a joint resolution excluding the vote of certain States for President in which he says:

In his view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution, have ample power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal.

Mr. Morron at the last session of Congress said, in the course of an argument upon this question:

You must have some tribunal to settle that difficulty, (the difficulty arising when two sets of electoral votes are presented,) and what tribunal is safer than the two Houses of Congress.

And again :

There can be under the Constitution no other tribunal to decide on that (the same question) or any other question arising in the course of counting the votes. The duty is imposed on the two Houses of Congress. They alone can perform it.

Mr. B. F. Butler, Representative HOAR of Massachusetts, and Senators Edmunds and Sherman, have all recognized and affirmed this right of Congress by having offered resolutions objecting to counting the votes of certain States in the year 1873.

The number of eminent statesmen thus hurrieally mentioned is suf-

The number of eminent statesmen thus hurriedly mentioned is sufficient to establish the fact that this power of Congress has been uninterruptedly recognized by our wisest and best men since the foundation of our Government, and here we might rest the proposition in safety; but still other incontestable proof crowds upon us. The fact exists beyond question that Congress has exercised this power ever since the ratification of the Constitution, and particularly since the adoption of the twelfth amendment.

In 1793 the following joint resolution was adopted by both Houses:

That the two Houses shall assemble in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock, that one person shall be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President, and, together with a list of the votes, shall be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

A precisely similar resolution was adopted in the year 1797, and a like one in 1801, but with the following additional clause:

And if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution, such entry upon the Journal shall be deemed a sufficient declaration thereof.

This resolution was re-adopted quadrennially until the year 1865; but in 1821 an additional provision was made for the State of Missouri, as follows:

Resolved. That if any objections be made to the vote of Missouri, and the counting or omitting to count which shall not essentially change the result of the election, in that case it shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of Missouri to be counted the result would be for A B for President of the United States — votes. If not counted, for A B for President of the United States — votes. But in either event A B is elected President of the United States. And in the same manner for Vice-President.

In 1837 the same provision was made for counting the vote of the State of Michigan.

The first section of the twenty-second joint rule, adopted in 1865, was not unlike those of former years, but the second section pointed out and determined the precise manner in which objections to counting the vote of any State should be disposed of. This joint rule of 1865 was used in that and the years 1869 and 1873.

Thus the views of our best statesmen during all the preceding years of our history, and the uninterrupted precedents of Congress itself, set forever at rest all disputes upon the question, and clearly establish in Congress the right to count the electoral votes of the

The next branch of the question to be discussed is to what extent can that power be exercised? Here again both the expressed views of our statesmen and the precedents established by Congress bring us an answer neither equivocal nor doubtful. That it can inquire into the legality of an electoral vote because of the ineligibility of the elector Henry Clay was clear in his convictions, and that it had a like power over every question which might be suggested as to the electoral vote is proven conclusively by the fact that in 1837, while the Senate was considering the joint rule for counting the electoral vote for that year, he moved and had inserted as an amendment thereto the following significant language:

Also, to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any votes were given at the recent election contrary to the prohibition contained in the second section of the second article of the Constitution, and, if any such votes were given, what ought to be done with them.

In 1820 he said:

In the case of questionable votes coming forward the Constitution was silent as to their being counted, but fortunately the end in that case carried with it the means. The two Houses were called upon to enumerate the votes for President and Vice-President. Of course they were called on to decide what are votes.

Mr. Archer, of Maryland, at that time also said, in speaking of the Wherever was ledged the power to receive a return there was also the power to pass judgment on the validity of that return.

Mr. Nicholas, in 1801, in a report to Congress upon that question,

The vacation of a ballot composed of sound and defective votes ought to be the result of uniform principles; it ought to take place on all occasions where a discrimination cannot be made or on none. Not to vacate such ballot, but to permit the election of a Chief Magistrate to be carried on any occasion by the aid of one or more defective votes, would be to heazard in most eminent degree the peace of the Union. It is of the last importance to the happiness of the people of the United States that a complete conviction should prevail at all times that the person who may be elected Chief Magistrate of the Union has been really elected by electors duly and really appointed of those having competent authority for that purpose. It were painful to anticipate the consequences which would too probably attend a disputed election to the Presidency. Those consequences might be more calamitous than can be foreseen.

At the time of the adoption of the twelfth amendment, Congress passed a law to carry it into effect, which contains the following significant provision:

But those certificates only of votes given for President and Vice-President of the United States shall be opened by the President of the Senate for the purpose of being counted which shall contain the list of votes given in conformity with the Constitution as in force on the day fixed by law for the meeting of the electors by whom the said votes shall have been given.

And it was in pursuance of this law and the Constitution that in the year 1857, while counting the electoral vote, Hon. John Crittenden in the House offered the following resolution, as indicative of Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the electoral vote of the State of Wisconsin in the late presidential election, being given on a day different from that prescribed by law, was therefore null, and ought not to have been admitted or included in the count of electoral votes given in the late presidential election.

In 1865, while discussing this question, Hon. John P. Haleremarked:

It is the dictate of the plainest common sense, independent of the constitutional provision, that there must of necessity be a power residing somewhere to preside over, rectify, and govern this whole transaction; and, although it would have been wise, in my humble judgment, for Congress to have passed this resolution preceding the presidential election, it by no means follows that it may not do it now. This law is not subject to the reproach of being a retrospective or retroactive act. Congress does not propose to say that any State shall not express its opinion. All that Congress proposes to say now is that, these States being in a condition where no valid, no constitutional election was held, their votes shall not be counted, and if we cannot do that it seems to me that we are powerless to do anything.

It may now be important to examine how this subject has been viewed by those statesmen who are still living and who are again called upon to determine this grave question. In examining the debates of Congress for the expression of those still on the theater of action we first fall upon the declarations of Mr. BOUTWELL, who, in 1865, said:

The counting of the votes unquestionably is to be "in the presence of the two

Have the two Houses power to do what by the Constitution is unavoidably made the duty of somebody to do, to see that the votes which are counted are real votes? By that I mean whether what is written upon the paper expresses the opinion which the people have given. Not only have the Senate and House of Representatives the power, but there is no other department of the Government that is clothed with that power.

Senator Conkling, in 1873, emphatically declared:

But I go further than to maintain the naked power of Congress to inquire. I insist that we can utilize the result of the inquiry, and employ the facts in our action upon counting or refusing to count electoral votes for President or Vice-President.

In the year 1873 Mr. BOUTWELL said:

I concur, therefore, most heartily in what the Senator from New York has said, that there ought to be a very careful investigation of this question, in order that, so far as we have the legislative power, if we have it at all—and I think we have—we may provide in the constitutional way for ascertaining what the will of the people of the various States may be from time to time, in respect of the election of a Chief Magistrate.

We might continue like quotations from distinguished statesmen who have maintained that this power is vested in Congress, for hours,

Thus our own construction of the Constitution, the construction which has universally been put upon it by the practice of Congress, the laws passed to carry it into execution, and the views expressed by our earlier and latest statesmen, impel us to the irresistible conclusion that Congress shall not only count the electoral vote, but that it possesses the undoubted judicial power to determine what are and what are not electoral votes; even to the extent of excluding illegal and unconstitutional ones.

HOW SHALL THE POWER BE EXERCISED.

The next question which presents itself in the consideration of this subject is: In what manner shall this power be exercised? The peculiar phraseology of that instrument is such as has given rise to many theories, and as many suggested plans. The only part of the Constitution touching directly upon this important question is as follows:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

Here three distinct powers are enumerated in connection with the act of counting. The President of the Senate, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, to each of which different minds ascribe the power; while, as the language does not especially fix the power upon either, it is contended by other minds that the expression "shall then be counted" leaves the power in Congress to determine by a law, "providing for the general welfare" or to "execute this Constitution," how and by whom they shall be counted.

Growing out of these various ideas, various plans have been from time to time suggested by different legislators. The various plans may be summarized as follows:

First. That the President of the Senate shall count the votes.

Second. That the two Houses of Congress shall count them in their Second. That the fresident of the Senate shall count the votes.

Second. That the two Houses of Congress shall count them in their separate capacity; and this idea is subdivided as follows:

1. When the two Houses do not concur in counting the vote of a State, it shall be rejected.

2. That the vote of all States shall be counted unless both Houses agree in rejecting it.

Third. That, in case of a disagreement between the two Houses as to how a vote shall be counted, the disputed question shall be submitted to an ulterior tribunal.

Fourth. That the vote shall be counted by the two Houses in joint assembly, the members of each voting indiscriminately, either per capita or by States.

Former legislators have forborne settling this question by a fixed law, and that delicate and important duty is now devolved upon us. Heretofore the mode has been unimportant because the adoption of Heretoire the mode has been unimportant because the adoption of either one would have produced the same result as if either of the others had been selected; but at this time the very mode becomes vital, as the result would be different under the operation of one plan than under that of another. Yet we, as legislators, representing the people, and not parties, should discard all partisan feeling, overlook all partisan results, and settle this question only in the lights which are thrown upon it by the Constitution, the precedents of the past, and the patriotic utterances of statesmen, made when party feeling could not have actuated them. could not have actuated them.

With these axioms then, let us approach the great work which lies before us. We will examine these various plans, or modes, in the order I have enumerated them.

SHALL THE VICE-PRESIDENT COUNT?

The Constitution invests this officer with certain enumerated powers in reference to the electoral vote. They are these: He shall be their custodian, and he shall open them in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives. Here the enumeration ends. The universal law of constraing constitutions, statutes, and contracts is that, where certain powers are expressly enumerated, all others are, by implication, excluded. In the leading case of Field vs. The People, reported in 2d Scam., page 79, this principle is fully indorsed. Chief-Justice Story, in his work upon the Constitution, in section 448, says:

There can be no doubt that an affimative grant of power, in many cases, will imply an exclusion of all others; as, for instance, the Constitution declares that the powers of Congress shall extend to certain enumerated cases. This specification of particulars evidently excludes all pretensions to a general legislative authority. And why? Because an affirmative grant of special powers would be absurd as well as useless if a general authority were intended.

In addition to this general principle, the fourth subdivision of section 3 of the first article of the Constitution prohibits him from exercising all or any powers except to decide a tie vote in the Senate.

The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

The language of the Constitution is:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of depresentatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

An analysis of this expression, according to the laws of the English language, will not permit such a construction. Had the author intended to invest that officer with the power of counting the votes he would have said "open all the certificates and count the votes." But he does not say this. To the contrary, he says plainly enough that he shall open them, and they shall be counted by some other person or persons. The sudden turn of language, the change of mode and tense after the conjunction "and," plainly assures us that the mind of the author had passed from the President of the Senate to some other object. Had it again reverted to that officer there would have been added the words "by him," and it would then have read, "open all the certificates and the vote shall then be counted by him." The total absence of expressions tantamount to this leaves no doubt in the mind of the scholar as to the intention of the framers of that instrument.

The precedents of Congress are all against the doctrine of clothing the President of the Senate with such extraordinary powers. In every instance the two Houses have maintained a controlling power over the count, either by joint resolutions or by directions during the progress of the count; and this power has invariably been denied by the Presidents of the Senate themselves. In the year 1797, upon making the announcement that officer said:

In obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and to the commands of both Houses of Congress, expressed in their resolutions passed in the present session, I now declare that John Adams is elected President, &c.

And such was the unbroken practice down to the year 1865, when Congress enacted the twenty-second joint rule, which put the power unquestionably in the hands of the two Houses, and under which the presidential vote was counted in the years 1865, 1869, and 1873.

Now let us examine the views of statesmen who have expressed themselves upon this important branch of our subject.

In the year 1857 that great constitutional lawyer and patriot John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky, said:

I wish merely to say that the sense of duty, an honorable sense of duty I have no doubt, upon which the presiding officer has acted in assuming to declare the number of votes, involves the privilege of determining a presidential election and saying who shall be President. I protest against any such power.

During the same debate many others whose names are now famous among the patriots of that day denounced this assumption; but I will select only that of Humphrey Marshall because it is clear and emphatic. He said:

Still, I am sure that the duty of determining whether a vote shall be counted belongs to the Senate and House, and not to the President of the Senate; and it is a duty I insist we should perform before the vote shall be counted. The House and Senate do not play the parts of automata, nor are they mere lookers-on at a spectacle in which the President of the Senate is sole performer.

In the year 1869 this same question arose in Congress, and again this power was denied that officer by all who spoke on the question. From among these I only select that of a gentleman then upon this floor, but since promoted to a seat in the United States Senate, Mr. BOUTWELL, from Massachusetts. He declared that

The President is not clothed with the power by any possible construction of the Constitution; the Supreme Court is not clothed with the power; there is no governmental instrumentality that can be named that has this power except the Senate and the House of Representatives. We all agree that under some circumstances this power ought to be exercised. We all agree that the Constitution contemplates purity, justice, not fraud or wrong.

In the year 1873, while the Senate was maturing a plan for disposing of this vexed question, Mr. Trumbull, then a Senator from the State of Illinois, in reply to Mr. MORTON, of Indiana, dealt with this power as follows:

Dower as 1010Ws:

In the first place, I do not agree with the Senator from Indiana as to the power of the presiding officer of the Senate over the electoral vote. The Constitution of the United States directs that the President of the Senate shall open the votes in the presence of the two Houses, and then says "and the votes shall then be counted." That is not such language, it seems to me, as the framers of the Constitution would have used, who were so very precise and particular in every phrase in all the instrument, if they had intended that the President of the Senate should determine as to the validity of those votes. The language then would be, not that the President of the Senate shall open the votes in the presence of the two Houses.

Again, in the year 1875, the same question was before that body for deliberation, and the discussion was careful, thorough, and patriotic, free from partisan bias and party feeling. Then Mr. Conkling, the distinguished Senator from New York, said:

distinguished Senator from New York, said:

Returning for a moment to these words in the Constitution, we find that the President of the Senate is to do but one thing, which is to open, and of course manually to present and be the custodian of, the returns upon which the election is to depend, which are called in this provision of the Constitution "the certificates."

Then we find the language changes, and it ordains in most mandatory phrase that "the votes shall then be counted." There, I submit, is appropriate domain for legislative discretion, either by legislation or by a joint rule, if concurrent action between the two Houses rather than by legislative action be preferred.

Nor was he alone in the expression of these views, but was supported by the ablest men in that august body. Among others who thus expressed themselves was that venerable Senator from New Jersey, Mr. Frelinghuysen, than whom few are abler or more competent to read correctly the great charter of our liberties. He asks and answers this grave question:

Who is to decide this question? Is it the presiding officer of the Senate, who may be a mere member of this body temporarily presiding and who has not been elected by the people? Is he, because by the Constitution he is made the medium of communicating the vote to the Senate and to the House, to have the power to receive and count these votes, and is there no power to control him? His duty is ended, sir, so far as the Constitution imposes it, when, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, he opens the certificates. That is all he is authorized to do by the twelfth amendment to the Constitution.

And, most important of all, Mr. Morton, of Indiana, then took strong ground against this power being vested in that officer, and clearly explained his functions under the Constitution. No argument, no elucidation could be clearer, could be more forcible. Hear

If, when the Senate comes to decide the question which is the correct return, if there is a tie vote in the Senate, and the Vice-President is presiding, not as President pro tempore, he can cast a vote in that case, deciding the question in the Senate; but there is no provision in our Constitution authorizing the Vice-President or any other officer of Government to come in and settle the question where the two Houses disagree. If there is a tie vote in the Senate, the Vice-President can cast the deciding vote; but it is not in conformity with the spirit of our Constitution to provide for some officer who shall settle between the two Houses when they disagree. Therefore it seems to me that this provision is a matter of necessity. You have got to leave this disputed question somewhere, and is it not safer, is it not more democratic, more republican, to leave it to the two Houses than to any single officer?

We need not pursue this subject further, but close with this remark: To clothe the President of the Senate with such unlimited and dangerous power would be making him more potent than a king; it would enable him to override the wishes of the people, trample upon the ballot-box, destroy the efficacy of elections, and subvert the very principles of republican government. Surely no party, even as the last resort to maintain its existence, will dare inaugurate such a scheme.

THE SEPARATE ACTION OF THE TWO HOUSES.

This power then not residing in the President of the Senate it must rest either in the two Houses acting separately or jointly; and we proceed to consider the effect of the separate action upon the proposition that, when the two Houses do not both agree to the counting of a vote, it shall be rejected.

This proposition carries with it as a natural consequence the power to refuse to count the vote of a State; in other words, the power to disfranchise a State, even though its vote may have been cast in full compliance with the Constitution, simply for political or partisan reasons. True, we should not presume that gentlemen acting under the serious restrictions of a solemn oath to obey the Constitution would exercise such a power without warrant, yet the danger of its being done exists and this forms a strong, though not conclusive, argument against the adoption of such a principle.

Yet this must be regarded as far preferable to that proposition which establishes the converse of the rule and enacts a law which counts every vote that shall be presented by the President of the Senate, unless both Houses agree that it shall not be counted. Such a proposition, if it stands at all, must stand upon the doctrine that its very existence—no matter by what illegal or unconstitutional means it attained that being, no matter how much it may violate every principle of law or the Constitution—gives it the power of a vote, and that it shall so remain unless both the separate judges shall be forced by the overwhelming power of its enormities to acknowledge its invalidity. In this particular the principle violates two other principles of law and reason.

The act of counting presupposes the right to exercise the judgment, reason, and discretion in determining what shall and shall not be included in the calculation. The plan under consideration undertakes to settle the question beforehand. Again, it is a well-settled principle of legal jurisprudence that where two judges are called upon to determine the admissibility or correctness of a matter coming before them, it cannot be admitted or affirmed unless both judges agree to admit or affirm it. This plan permits the vote to be affirmed or admitted unless both agree to its rejection. A rule so contrary to principles governing all other courts and tribunals must be received, if received at all, with forebodings of danger. Many of our best statesmen have put the brand of their disapproval upon this proposition and declared it inimical to our highest and best interests. Senator Frelinghuysen took ground against it in 1875, and, contrasting it with the first proposition I have discussed, said:

Even this rule would not remove entirely the temptation; for the House by not joining the Even this rule would not remove entirely the temptation; for the House by not joining the Senate in rejecting improper votes might so affect the result that no one would have a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and thus the election would go to the House.

Senator EDMUNDS, on the same occasion, forcibly put the wrong of this principle when he said:

Let me suppose another case. Suppose the paper that the Vice-President receives and opens to be counted according to the Constitution is not the vote of Vermont at all; that it has been sent as the vote of Vermont from the State of Indiana; nevertheless, on this rule, unless both Houses concur in saying that they will not have the State of Indiana vote for Vermont, she votes.

Again he says of this principle:

It is in effect to say that any spurious or revolutionary vote which may be brought forward from people pretending to be electors of a State shall be counted, unless both Houses agree that it shall not. It is not brought forward for decision, but it stands, because it comes as the authoritative voice of the people, until both Houses concur in saying it is not a vote.

But the error of both these rules is more readily seen in cases where two sets of returns are sent in from the same State; in which case the first vote opened would be counted, or both rejected; and this, too, notwithstanding the first vote may be the very one which is without law and wholly unconstitutional. Senator Thurman, of Ohio, states the case in its true light when he says:

The moment you have decided, either by the difference of the two Houses as to the counting of the returns or in any other manner, that that return shall be counted, the vote of that State is given and no other vote from it can be received. Can there be anything clearer than that? Suppose there be two returns from Louisiana, one of them is presented and an objection is made to its count. The Houses separate, and one of the Houses decides that it shall be counted. Would it not be counted then? No one will say no. Then suppose the other return is presented. What is the objection to that? "We have counted Louisiana once; we cannot count her again. We have given her all the votes to which she is entitled; we cannot receive any further returns from that State." But now, if by our act we make a difference of opinion between the two Houses equal to a judgment of both Houses in favor of the reception of a return, it is just as plain as that two and two make four that when you have counted one return the matter is res adjudicata, and you cannot count another.

But Senator Morton, in a recent speech in the Senate, disclosed the most dangerous feature of this rule by showing clearly that it is but a renewal of the claim for the power to rest in the hands of the President of the Senate. He said:

President of the Senate. He said:

I do not understand that this rule, in its present form or in the new form proposed to be given it, takes away what I believe to be the power of the Vice-President. The Constitution says that the votes of the electors shall be sealed up and sent to the President of the Senate, and he shall open them in the presence of both Houses, and there are two sets of returns; he brings forward one set and keeps the other; how will you get the other set out of his hands? What power have you? He is only required to produce the set that does represent the vote of the State; he is not required to produce both packages; he is only required to produce that package which does contain the electoral vote of the State. Therefore he may exercise his judgment upon that, and you have no power for objection. You cannot go behind him. That shows the necessity for an amendment of the Constitution. This rule cannot change that. It does not undertake to change it. It simply provides for objections on such papers as he does present and as are opened to be counted. That is all there is of that.

Thus being driven by the force of logic and by a fair construction of the Constitution from the position that the President of the Senate should count the vote, its advocates undertake to accomplish the same purpose by investing him with the power to judge which set of returns he shall open; and this, too, under the deceptive pretense that the two Houses are conceded to have the exclusive power to Certainly no fair-minded gentleman in either Hall of Congress can have the audacity to insist upon the enforcement of a proposition so destructive in its force and effect.

SHALL THE POWER BE DELEGATED ?

Theorizers and speculators having thus devised three separate plans for disposing of the subject under consideration, and each of these having their disadvantages and unconstitutional features, other theorists have conceived the fourth plan, to which I have before alluded. And this last plan is virtually to take all power of counting from Congress and place it in the hands of a commission to be raised for that purpose. This plan first made its appearance in Congress in the year 1800, and no doubt was suggested by the fact that theretofore three tellers had been selected to do the clerical work in counting the electoral year.

It was first offered and pressed in that year by the federalists then having a majority in both the Senate and House of Representatives.

having a majority in both the Senate and House of Representatives. The democrats, under the leadership of Jefferson, earnestly opposed it; Mr. Gallatin championing the opposition in the House and Mr. Barbour in the Senate. It failed to become a law.

Again, in 1875, Senator Edmunds presented the same plan to the Senate, but it there shared the fate of being unceremoniously defeated. At the early part of the present session Mr. Hunter, of Indiana, introduced the measure into this House, where it was received without favor or even comment. Such is its legislative history, and such I have no doubt would have been its end had it not been for the such I have no doubt would have been its end had it not been for the circumstances surrounding us, which, calling for a committee of conference between the two Houses, placed Mr. EDMUNDS at its head, who, as all men will, urged his own favorite idea upon the committee; a committee which, beside him, was void of any plan of their own, or were gifted with less ability to urge it. That committee having reported this measure to the two Houses, and being thus backed and urged on under the cry of "compromise," now demands an attention which it otherwise would never have commanded.

The plan proposed by the committee submits the counting of all disputed votes to a commission composed in part of individuals out-disputed votes to a commission composed in part of individuals outside of either House of Congress, and thus to a tribunal not enumerated in the Constitution. Without entering further into details, the question presses itself upon us, Is such a procedure constitutional?

In the outset it must be admitted that at no time in the hundred year s of our national existence has this plan been adopted, and therefore we have no precedent to support its claims to constitutionality. The precedents are all against it. It is further admitted that nowhere within the lines of the Constitution is such a tribunal for such a purpose provided for. The point upon which its friends hold it to be pose provided for. The point upon which its friends hold it to be constitutional is that Congress has the power to provide any mode and manner or form of counting the electoral vote which may please them. They say that the expression in the twelfth amendment, "and the votes shall then be counted," is a casus omissus, and that the provision of the last subdivision of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution enables them to make a law filling up this asserted omission. That provision, in enumerating the powers which Congress shall possess, says:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof.

But if the plan is unconstitutional, it is so for reasons not touched by this provision at all. It is unconstitutional, it is so for reasons not touched by this provision at all. It is unconstitutional because the power to count the electoral vote is expressly and therefore exclusively vested in Congress, and cannot be delegated by it to any body of men outside of its number. Every argument which ever has been or ever can be made in favor of the proposition that Congress has the power to count the electoral vote also establishes the principle that the power has been delegated to Congress. has been delegated to Congress. The one proposition follows the other as an irresistible consequence. If Congress has the power to count, that power has been delegated to her and she must count. If the people have delegated that power to her, they have delegated it to no other tribunal, and they have nowhere empowed Congress to erect any such other tribunal.

The Supreme Court has twice decided that the first section of the third article only empowered Congress to establish law and equity courts, as is plainly conveyed by the language of that clause:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and estab-

Certainly no man will be so insane or presume so much upon the ignorance of others as to contend for a moment that the commission now proposed to be raised is a court, that it is a body for the hearing and trying of causes between litigants. Who are the plaintiffs and defendants, the relators and respondents? But if it were a court, Congress could not invest it with jurisdiction over a subject expressly delegated to itself. The language of the twelfth amendment, which I have already quoted, plainly intends that Congress shall, and shall then, count the vote; not after the certificates shall have been opened for days and passed out of its hands into the custody and hands of strangers, but then, at the time the certificates are opened. This plan permits days and weeks to pass before the votes shall be counted, and permits the counting to be done not in the presence of both

Certainly this is not merely an infraction, but it is also a fatal vio-lation of the Constitution. Nor do I stand alone in this declaration. Fortunately this subject has received the attention of our statesmen in calmer and better times than these, and they have given us their views upon it when there were no party ends to be gained or lost by its adoption or rejection. Their convictions under such favorable auspices should be of value to us now. In 1875, while discussing the Edmunds substitute proposing this plan, Mr. BOUTWELL in the Senate

I agree entirely with the suggestion made by the honorable chairman of the committee in regard to the power to count the votes and the duty to count the votes, that one was conferred upon Congress and the other enjoined upon Congress. The power and the duty are in Congress. Congress must exercise the power and perform the duty, and it is not possible under the Constitution to transfer it to anybody else.

Again, speaking upon the same subject, he remarked:

The President of the Senate is not clothed with the power by any possible construction of the Constitution; the Supreme Court is not clothed with the power; there is no governmental instrumentality which can be named that has the power except the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. Morton at that time asserted that this power could not even be delegated to the Supreme Court. These are his emphatic words: You cannot take it into court; that is certain.

And again he said more at length:

In the first place it is a plan that is unknown to any plan of legislation which we have. * * * And it involves another danger perhaps equal to that in its character: it leaves the determination of this great question to eight men, or rather to a majority of eight men, which would be five. You substitute the judgment of eight men, or a majority of them, for the judgment of the two Houses.

Mr. Howe was no less decided in his convictions upon this question:

I will give my own opinion. My own opinion is that it cannot be delegated; and therefore, if I were driven to the conclusion that the decision of this grave question, this momentous question, this question upon which, under conditions entirely conceivable, may hang the issues of civil war—if I were driven to the conclusion that that is a legislative question, I should say that, when the question arises which one of these letters from Rhode Island shall be respected as the voice of Rhode Island, it must be settled either by the joint convention or by the several Houses acting separately; nor can it be left to arbitration, no matter who may be the arbitrators.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, while discussing this plan in the Senate, also remarked:

I think the twelfth amendment to the Constitution settles who has jurisdiction over this question. It does not do so in express terms, but it does so by necessary implication. That by necessary implication, to my mind, gives the jurisdiction over this subject to the two Houses, and if the Constitution does give it to the two Houses we cannot by law give it to the judiciary of the country.

Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, also took strong ground against it.

Whether the President of the Senate could be trusted, or whether the gentlemen selected in the amendment of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey could be, or those high characters who constitute the Supreme Court of the United States, (which is, in my opinion, the best of all the amendments,) it is enough to my mind that they have no other authority to designate a President of the United States than that which they derive from this statute, and that, while the Constitution of the United States took what its framers thought was all necessary pains at that time to guard and secure the selection by the people of a President, it has been left to us here to discuss the question whether by a statute we cannot safely designate a man or men who will select for us a President of the United States. Sir, that is such a departure from the Constitution that I cannot vote for it.

He continues, without hesitancy, and, reaching the point where it appears evident the vote must ultimately be decided by the one man who shall constitute a majority of the commission to be selected, he declares:

If there were no objection, it is a power reposed in one man or in ten men, however high their character, that it would not be safe to confer. It is in violation of all the analogies and all the theories upon which the Government itself is based, and it would be the strangest anomaly, in what would otherwise be called a free Government of the people, that, although in all things else the nation and the Constitution had studied to give effect to the voice of the people, we had here deliberately, by a short section of three lines, selected a man and clothed him with the power of saying who shall be the President of the United States.

These opinions, it will be said, are from gentlemen composed of one political party only, and should therefore be received with caution.

But, sir, this was not a partisan view of it; there were gentlemen, distinguished gentlemen of both political parties, who took early oc casion to denounce the plan as unconstitutional and extremely dan-gerous. Let us now look to the views of the gentlemen on the other side of the Senate Chamber. First, Mr. BAYARD, of New Jersey, condemned it. He said:

There is no distinct provision as to that. They shall be simply counted in the presence of the two Houses; but I apprehend from the fact of their being counted and the result declared, that the members of each House are simply witnesses to the count and tally of that vote. That you could not delegate that power to another body I cannot doubt.

Mr. THURMAN, of Ohio, was no less decided in his views, as here

But there was one branch of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] upon which I wish to say a word because, with great respect for his opinions, I am unable to concur with him, and that is in regard to the idea expressed by him that the election of a President of the United States may be made the subject of a contest in the courts of the United States. To this view I entirely dissent.

And afterward, pursuing the subject more in detail, he said:

I do not see, therefore, that you can confer this power upon the supreme judges as judges sitting as a supreme court to decide this question, because it is not a judicial question within the meaning of the Constitution, and to say that you could confer it upon them as mere individuals is to say that you can confer it upon any other nine individuals in the United States.

And, as if determined not to be misunderstood, or as if extremely anxious that the unconstitutionality of the plan should be deeply impressed upon the Senate, on the 16th of March last he repeated his

I do say that the spirit of the Constitution requires that this matter shall be settled, if it is possible to settle it, by the Senate and House of Representatives, either acting separately or in joint convention. Either one way or the other the Constitution requires that it shall be settled in that mode. * * * And it seems to me that it never was contemplated that the determination of any question which should arise upon that count should be decided by some other tribunal or body of

Mr. Stevenson, of Kentucky, was no less pronounced in his conviction as to the unconstitutionality of the plan to delegate this power to any body, and in discussing the proposition to delegate to the President of the Senate the power of casting the deciding vote on all questions which the two Houses may differ in, he said:

I voted against the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FreLing-Huysen,] not only because we, in my judgment, have no constitutional power to select an arbitrator to decide a presidential question, but also for reasons of obvious im-propriety if the power existed.

Senator Johnston, of Virginia, lays down the true doctrine in the following extract from his speech in the Senate on the 22d of March, 1876:

The members of this body and the members of the House of Representatives were elected by the people partly to perform this very function. They were chosen for the purpose, among others, of deciding who in a certain contingency should be President and Vice-President. When the people voted for them they delegated them to fulfill those duties; they elected them for that purpose as well as other purposes; and when we leave the question with the men thus elected by the people we leave it whene republican government ought to leave it, with the people or with the representatives of the people. But if we take it away from them and give it to nine other men never selected by the people, knowing little of the people, necessarily by the very nature of their functions and duties removed from the people and in no sense representing them, we get the decision of that great question away from a representative body of men to a body never elected by the people and having little connection with them. I can imagine no provision that would be further from the spirit of the Constitution and of our republican institutions, unless it would be to select six or eight of the ministers who represent foreign governments in this city and let them be constituted a court to decide upon this question.

Mr. MEREMON, the able Senator from North Carolina, assumed the

Mr. Merrimon, the able Senator from North Carolina, assumed the same position and on that day asserted that—

The exclusive jurisdiction is in Congress; and I think so for reasons which I will not now detain the Senate to express. Entertaining that view, we have no power to delegate to the President of the Senate or to the Supreme Court, or to commissioners, or to any tribunal whatsoever, the right to decide any controverted question arising upon the count of the vote.

I have thus selected an equal number of gentlemen from both political parties who have declared their convictions of its radical unconstitutionality; but I cannot close these quotations without citing the views of Senator Conkling, of New York, who is now distinguished as the leading friend of this measure in the Senate. On the 25th day of February, 1875, in a speech in the Senate on this same question, he

It may well be doubted whether we have power to do any such thing. Congress may do whatever is committed to it as a Congress. Either House or both Houses may do whatever is committed to them; but Congress cannot delegate to anybody else legislative power or any other power which is reposed in Congress and located there and nowhere else.

In examining the vote in the Senate on this proposition, given on the 25th instant, I discover that many of the gentlemen from whom I have quoted voted for the bill, and thus against their former convictions. I shall not attempt to account for this manifest inconsistency. I expect many gentlemen upon this floor to vote for the measure who are thoroughly convinced of its unconstitutionality. I wish it were otherwise. I should have stronger and brighter hopes of the future of my country could I be assured that its legislators would never consent to a violation of that sacred instrument, the Constitution, simply because the masses, alike ignorant and regardless of its provisions, demanded it. For me, sir, the cry of the rabble and the howls of the mob have no terrors. In their calmer moments the people have selected me to adjudicate this question for myself and to execute that Constitution. This duty I shall do fearlessly, and it shall never be said of me that I knowingly committed a great wrong in violating the safe provisions of the people's bulwark in the vain hope of relieving them from an imagined inconvenience or even danger. I hold their highest safety lies in the safety of that instrument. This measure is urged upon us as a compromise. What is to be com-

This measure is urged upon us as a compromise. What is to be compromised? If I am to compromise any rights which this House—the House of the people—has under the Constitution, then I tell you I shall oppose it. If I am called upon to compromise any rights which belong to the majority of our people as expressed at the ballot-box, then, sir, I oppose it. If I am called upon to compromise any honest conviction I possess as to the result of the recent election by the people, then I oppose it. If I am required to compromise the unconsti-tutional claim that the President of the Senate has the power to count the electoral vote, then, sir, I shall oppose it, because I shall never trifle with so dangerous and destructive a doctrine. I demand that it shall be frowned down, voted down, and trampled down by the people. We were not sent here, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, to trade off, sell, or barter any of these high, important, and vital questions. Our duty is to meet the false assumptions of power which are set up by the enemies of popular government, and beat them back with mailed hands, if need be; not to cower and flinch before

No man can favor this bill simply because it is constitutional. He must do so, if he does at all, with the expectation of deriving some partizan advantage from it. The republican does so expecting it will result in the election of Mr. Hayes; the democrat does so expecting it to result in the election of Mr. Tilden. It is evident that somebody will be deceived, somebody will be cheated by the bill. It cannot but be a cheat and a fraud; it cannot but produce murmurs and dissatisfaction when its full results are made known. Like all other attempts to barter away great principles at the expense of the Conattempts to barter away great principles at the expense of the Constitution and the dictates of enlightened judgments, it will ultimately but awaken the indignation of an outraged people and the condemnation of an honest public. Such was the fate of the compromises of 1820 and 1852.

No gentleman should give this measure his support without understanding fully the effect of what he is doing. It will constitute a commission composed of fifteen individuals. Seven of these will consist of one political party and eight of the other party. The odd-numbered man must be selected from the four supreme judges not designated in the bill. Of these four, three are pronounced republicans, namely, Bradley, Hunt, and Swayne, and Mr. David Davis, who has little or no politics. Mr. Davis, having just been elected to the United States Senate, would not be offered a place in the commission and would not accept it if he were. The choice, then, must tall upon a republican. A republican then will decide every controverted question coming before the commission. Our democratic friends have bitterly opposed the the commission. Our democratic friends have bitterly opposed the idea of putting this power in the hands of Mr. Ferry, President of the Senate, simply because he is a republican, and yet they now propose to vest this same power in the hands of no less a partisan than he. What matters it whether Mr. FERRY or Mr. Bradley or Huntor Swayne count the vote? You are jeopardizing the expressed will of the people in the hands of the one as well as the other. I cannot and never shall consent to trust any one man with such tremendous power. I would not even if he were of my own party.

I have listened, in and out of Congress, to daily denunciations of returning boards. My own people have denounced them in unmeasured terms. Gentlemen upon this floor have howled for hours in mad fury against them. Public sentiment everywhere and at all times stamps its seal of utter condemnation upon the odious, dangerous, and destructive system; and yet, sir, I am astonished to find demo-crats here and elsewhere engaged in extending this monster, and erecting here, at the very capital of the nation, a returning board with more unlimited and unbridled power than any which has disgraced Louisiana and robbed her people of their sovereignty. I too have denounced these hydra-headed monsters in the past, and I denounce them now.

I am one of the many who sincerely believe Mr. Tilden to have been elected President of the United States, and I am solicitous that he should be given the chair of the Chief Executive to which he has been chosen by the people, but I do not want him to be so declared by any body of men selected through unconstitutional means. I do not wish his title to that high position justly attacked by those who opposed him upon any constitutional grounds. It would paralyze his arm, it would render him powerless to do that good to the country which our condition requires. For the democratic party to yze his arm, it would render him powerless to do that good to the country which our condition requires. For the democratic party to go into semi-power under such circumstances would insure our over-throw at the next biennial State elections. Rather than this should be, I would prefer Mr. Hayes be declared President by the usurped power of the Senate, backed by the Army and Navy; for then the wrong and the oppression would bring to our ranks, at the next succeeding presidential election, such overwhelming numbers that our title transpressed that any would not be specified. title to power could not and would not be questioned.

While I expect this bill to pass and become a law, I yet have a strong and abiding faith that our country will not be inflicted with the wrong. I have a faith that the judges of our Supreme Court will hold themselves aloof from the commission. I sincerely hope they will not permit their ermine to be drabbled with the muddy slime of politics, and the confidence which their stations should inspire to be destroyed and the conndence which their stations should inspire to be destroyed by the anathemas that will go up from a disappointed populace all around them. Never again let our judiciary be condemned for its politics as was the case when the Dred Scott decision was rendered. For the sake of my country, for the sake of my constituents, whose safety lies in the integrity of our judiciary, never again let their actions be hawked upon the hustings and bar-rooms as in the years just prior to the late war. I say to these judges now, stand away! Touch it not! it not!

But we are further urged to support this bill by the argument that it is the only method by which the differences between the two Houses can be reconciled. This argument is as false as all others that are brought forward to support the measure. In the first place, it permits no differences to exist between the Houses, because it takes all questions from them.

But there is a mode of procedure under which both Houses can act and settle all controverted questions. It is this: When the two Houses meet to count the vote for President they should meet in joint convention, and all questions which may arise during the progress of the count be settled by a vote of the Senators and Representatives aggregated, upon motion regularly disposed of under proper parlia-mentary rules. In this manner the voice of both branches of Congress will be heard and their influence felt in the disposal of every important question, thus modifying and to some extent neutralizing the party majority of either, and thereby render the mode less obnoxious to the charge of being a mere party machine.

There is another feature of this plan which will commend it to those who view our Constitution as a homogeneous system of well-devised government. In aggregating and counting the electoral vote it will bring into requisition the same forces and in precisely the same manner the identical powers which cast the vote at the capitals of the various States. To make this proposition plainer, we call attention to the organization of the electoral college. In electing the Chief Executive, by the wisdom of our fathers, the States in their organic form have a distinct representation and power which is felt in the two electors at large in each State, while the people, as individuals, have a power represented by the district electors. As the people and States are thus represented in the electoral college, so in the same proportion is each represented in the two branches of Congress; the Senate being the States, the House of Representatives the people. The Senate and House are counterparts of the electoral college, representing the same powers, reflecting the same sources. The electwho view our Constitution as a homogeneous system of well-devised resenting the same powers, reflecting the same sources. The electroral college, representing the same powers, reflecting the same sources. The electroral college, meeting in detached portions at different points to do the work assigned each integral part, its counterpart should bring its work together at the great center, correct all imperfections, and aggregate the total result.

This is not call a particital but a local college, representing the same sources.

This is not only a patriotic but a logical and legal deduction from our system of government, and in our judgment precisely what was intended by the framers of the Constitution as contained within the expression of the twelfth amendment, wherein it says:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

Note the expression: not in the presence of the "two Houses" separately, but in the presence of both as one. And the votes shall not be counted after the two Houses shall have held hours of separate sessions, (as under the precedents of the past and under the twenty-second jointrule,) but then, at the time of being opened, they shall be counted.

This plan is neither novel nor new, but it is one that has been contended for as the proper interpretation of the Constitution since the adoption of that instrument. In the year 1800 it was advocated by Thomas Jefferson, and supported by Macon, Barbour, Gallatin, and all other democrats in both Houses of Congress, at which time it was all other democrats in both Houses of Congress, at which time it was opposed and defeated by the old federalists, who were then in power. In the Senate Macon offered this plan as an amendment to a bill then pending, and it was defeated by a vote of 10 to 15—all the Jeffersonian democrats supporting it. In the House the amendment was offered by Mr. Gallatin, and was there defeated by a vote of 44 to 46; it there commanding the vote of four moderate federalists. Among the distinguished statesmen who have favored it in Congress from time to time I shall pause to mention a few only. Mr. Archer of Maryland, Cobb of Georgia, in 1857; Nourse, Pugh, and Orr in the same year; Cowan of Pennsylvania, in 1865; Butler and BOUTWELL, in 1869; MERRIMON in 1875, and RANDOLPH, CONKLING, JOHNSTON and EATON, in 1876.

I have already trespassed upon the time of the House too long to detain it with quotations from the unanswerable arguments of these gentlemen in favor of this proposition. The only argument that has ever been or can be made against it has grown and must grow out of a jealousy on the part of members of the Senate, who object on the ground that the importance of the Senate will be submerged in the ground that the importance of the Senate will be submerged in the superior numbers of the Lower House. We need not stop to confute this false position. It is tantamount to saying that they are fearful of the power of the people; as the House represents the people and the Senate represents the States. And this forms an impregnable argument against these pretensions of the Senate.

Viewed, then, in the light of law, in the face of the Constitution, and in the impulses of patriotism, the conclusion is inevitable that in counting the electoral vote the Senate and House of Representatives should sit as a joint body, governed by parliamentary law, discharging its important duties as statesmen, and accepting the result in the spirit of patriotism.

[Mr. DUNNELL addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Mr. Speaker, a crisis in our history approaches, in which our institutions are trembling in the balance. From this audience chamber must be spoken by the nation's representatives words which may lull to rest the surging passions of prejudice or fire the nation's heart to deeds of violence and of lust.

Here, from this tribunal, in which the nation is spectator, I propose to give expression to the sentiment of my constituents, as I hope to understand them aright upon the merits of the bill now under consideration.

In no portion of our country are State pride and national honor more harmoniously blended than among the inhabitants of the district I have the honor to represent. Reverence for the Constitution, respect for the law, obedience to legitimate authority, acquiescence in the popular will rendered according to established forms, faith in the principle of democratic government, that the people are the true source of power and the sovereigns of the nation, these distinguish the diversified population who, on the margin of the Hudson, have pursued those industries and activities which illustrate the highest pursued those industries and activities which illustrate the highest form of our civilization and what capacity exists in our institutions to render a people prosperous and happy. Sir, they would not sur-render a right which they possess or a privilege which they enjoy as part of their inheritance of freedom; neither would they consent that by any act of theirs this inheritance should not be permitted to descend with all its blessings to their posterity. Absorbed and en-grossed as others may be in the acquisition of material good, in the accumulation of wealth, in the fierce struggle for success in all the various occupations and employments in which they are engaged, they are by no means insensible to those higher and nobler considerations which involve the welfare of the whole country, nor are they wanting in that patriotic pride which would yield individual preferment and cherished convictions if thereby a national disaster might be averted.

A people who would voluntarily relinquish rights secured to them A people who would voluntarily reiniquish rights seemed to them by the sacrifice and suffering of their progenitors are not the worthy custodians of freedom, nor are they fit to guard its battlements who, having made provision for their own security, bequeathed to their own posterity a structure dilapidated by the ravages of time and concealing beneath a fair exterior the moldering elements of ruin.

The principle which above all others must be preserved and handed down by the property and unfattered in that we know how to govern one.

down by us pure and unfettered is that we know how to govern our-selves; that when occasion demands we can rise superior to our own limited and narrow views, we can trample under foot our prejudices, we can defy the suggestions of interest, the allurements of false ambition, the vulgar clamor for personal recognition and material display; that we can even break the trammels of party, and not insist upon reserving for it what was meant for mankind.

No man can say he has discharged the whole duty of an American citizen who has proved only fidelity to his party, nor can he be a faithful party man who does not regard the cause of his country as the paramount object of his solicitude and his affections.

cannot be denied that a crisis has arrived in our history which will determine how far we have advanced in making these principles the rule of our conduct. Already it begins to be manifest that the vir-tue which in theory is necessary to the orderly maintenance of a free government is here to-day practically equal to the strain.

Sir, the report of the electoral committee practically refutes the criticism that there are no men in public life who represent the rectitude and probity which distinguished the earlier history of the Republic; and I confidently expect such powerful support will be given to the recommendations contained therein that we shall have no reason to bewail ourselves as a degenerate or a degraded race, unworthy recipients of the trust committed to our care.

Whatever others may think, Mr. Speaker, whatever others may feel, I, for one, in the interest of my people, will grapple with hooks of steel the hand which in this hour of doubt and of peril is stretched forth in good faith and with a firm purpose to save our country the distraction and tumult which are sure to ensue from divided councils and from partisan zeal.

Hesitation, Mr. Speaker, is no part of my duty when I appreciate the manifold advantages to all the great interests which are threat-ened by a delay to settle and dispose of the delicate and complicated questions now confronting the American people.

I do not ask that we shall barter away our rights, that for the sake of expediency we shall abandon principle.

It is sufficient for me to know that millions of people, who are the depositaries of civil liberty, are struggling so to bear the sacred flame that its light will not be extinguished. It is by the utmost vigilance, such are the infirmities of our nature, we can so moderate the struggle for power amid contending factions that neither shall be permitted to secure an advantage to themselves which may threaten or endanger the general welfare.

I need not enter upon any lengthened argument to show the conformity of this bill to the Constitution. It appears to me based upon the fact that the Constitution fails to make provision for the continuous gency which has happened, but has left it in the power of Congress so to legislate as to carry into effect the power already granted. It is certain the people of this country will not consent that the President of the Senate shall count the electoral votes unless his right so to do shall be the deliberate opinion of a tribunal authorized by law to decide the question. The votes are to be counted by some compe-tent authority on the 14th day of February. If both Houses of Congress are to concur, and this concurrence is necessary to a choice, then, according to the political status of the House and the Senate, there can be no choice.

Shall it be possible that the wisdom, the prudence, the intellectual Shall it be possible that the wisdom, the prudence, the intellectual power of this great nation shall not be summoned to immediate activity to find judicial solution of the problem? Are we, the representatives of the people, sworn officers of the law, by our indifference, supineness, or neglect, to occupy our seats in this Chamber while a cloud, dark and portentous, is moving up the horizon, surcharged with all the electric elements of wee and death. Have we no duty to discharge of higher moment than the success of our party; no ambition of nobler aim than to advance its standard?

Sir, when the Turk at the recent conference of the European powers was told that the only terms upon which a peaceful settlement of the controversy could be obtained was such as involved the surrender of his sovereignty over certain provinces, and that a failure on his part to accede to such terms would array all Europe against him, the indignant Moslem instantly rejected the proposition, exclaiming, "No! Death before dishonor." These words, carried by the lightning's flash through the civilized world, have absolutely awakened a sentiment of sympathy and of admiration, because even a Turk so loves his country that he would perish rather than submit to her degradation.

Sir, would it exalt our country in the esteem of mankind if we should so conduct the line of this great argument as to proclaim to the nation that we would rather die than acquiesce in the elevation to office of any man not of our political faith or in the investment of power with a party against whose principles we have been in irreconcilable antagonism? Do we derogate from the respect due to our Constitution when we labor to preserve it by the sacrifice of our par-

If we shall discover the ability to rise above all other considera-tions than those which affect the public good, if men of both parties shall declare that their country shall claim an undivided allegiance, then indeed may we hope to perpetuate those blessings to posterity Sir, we have a country, we have a Government worth preservation. Is not the picture which presents itself to-day, showing the disastrous effect of the uncertainty and doubt impending over us, calculated to urge us in our efforts to a speedy settlement? The tremendous billows which threaten to overwhelm us in a common catastrophe will subside into gentle undulations when it has been announced this bill has passed. I believe it. Do you not suppose the exhibition of disinterested patriotism given to the people by their representatives here will awaken a kindred sentiment throughout the land, and so infuse a spirit of loyal enthusiasm as to induce a generous submission to the arbitrament of the commission as a wise and just expression of the law in its dignity and purity ?

Trade has languished, commerce has been depressed, confidence almost destroyed, fortunes have been wrecked, and the pillars of the social edifice so shaken that there was grave reason to apprehend the whole structure would fall in irremediable ruin.

In this emergency the people look to you for succor and relief. In the fortitude with which they have endured; in the calm, subdued, patient waiting for a change; in the composure and self-restraint in which they have rested until political questions should be settled by which they have rested until political questions should be settled by lawful authority, we may gather wisdom and profit by their example. It is a noble exhibition of popular forbearance; millions of people with resentments aroused by disappointments, exhausted by resistance to repeated disasters, looking forward to new men and new measures in the hope of restoration, and yet with so grand and all-pervading a sense of the majesty of law, of the selected agencies through which it would vindicate itself, that no voice of menace or defiance is raised, no tempest of reproach and indignation to disturb the judicial temper with which you are to conduct your deliberations.

When the people and their representatives thus mutually act and react upon each other for the consummation of the general good, for the perpetuity of civil liberty and the security of individual rights, then, no matter how complicated and divergent the interests to be consulted, the disorders to be controlled, or the tyrannous passions to be subdued, no confusion will be permitted to agitate the counteto be subdued, no confusion will be permitted to agitate the countenance of the sweet angel of peace or compel her to a refuge in some happier and more favored clime, if such may be found on this storm-tossed and tempest-riven globe. I take a historic glance at the earlier civilization of mankind. All through the ages the pathway of our race is lurid with the fires kindled by their own fierce struggles for supremacy and power. The standard of dominion has been upborne, all unmindful of the blood and agony of the surging masses whose ranks have been decimated that power might triumph. Shall we, with armor forged in the laboratories of experience and defenses erected out of the muniments of time, fail to withstand the enemies our own passions and pride have created? No; a thousand times no! We may be able to defy a world in arms, but can claim no right to perpetuity until we learn how to govern ourselves. Founded upon this rock, the storm may beat, the waves may dash; we shall be only washed to purer whiteness by the deluge which overwhelms all other political fabrics.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, we have now arrived at that period in our national history foretold by Chancellor Kent in his Commentaries, wherein he says that if ever the tranquillity of this nation is to be disturbed and its liberties endangered by a struggle for power, it will be upon the subject of the choice of a President.

We have found a weak link in the great political chain that binds us together as a nation, and it will depend upon the wisdom of Congress whether that link shall be strengthened or whether it shall be broken to the disturbance and perhaps destruction of our national

An ambiguous clause in the Constitution, which fails to declare by what authority the electoral votes shall be counted, has left us in the face of a great national difficulty; and to avoid that difficulty, and provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, is the object of the bill under consideration.

Its importance cannot be exaggerated, and it therefore becomes our duty carefully to examine the ambiguous clause in the Consti-our duty carefully to examine the ambiguous clause in the Constitution and the remedy proposed in the present bill.

It is contended by many that the authority given to the President of the Senate to open all the certificates of the electoral votes, which shall then be counted, confers upon him the power to examine into and decide what votes shall be counted when two or more antagonistic sets of votes are forwarded from any State.

nistic sets of votes are forwarded from any State.

It is contended that such authority authorizes him to declare which are the votes that have been legally cast and should be counted, and which should be rejected as not warranted by the Constitution or by the laws of the State in which they were cast.

This construction would give to the President of the Senate the power in disputed cases of determining upon his own judgment who should be the President of the United States; a vast power which would involve directly or indirectly the whole policy of the Government and commit to a single man, in an emergency scarcely contemplated by involve directly or indirectly the whole policy of the Government and commit to a single man, in an emergency scarcely contemplated by the framers of the Constitution the destiny, happiness, and welfare of a whole people, in the presence of the Representatives of the people, more recently elected than he, more closely connected with them and more conversant with their wants, wishes, and necessities, and who would be allowed no voice of remonstrance against his action.

The question then occurs, did the framers of the Constitution intend to give such a vast, power to the President of the Senata?

tend to give such a vast power to the President of the Senate † To arrive at just conclusions we must consider the language and its interpretation by those who have acted under it from the formation of the Constitution to the present time.

The language in the original Constitution and the twelfth amendment is the same.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

The officer appointed to "open" the certificates is clearly defined, but by whom shall they be counted, or when opened who shall decide whether one of two antagonistic sets of votes from a State shall be counted to the exclusion of the other? On this point the Constitution is silent. It is obvious that the framers of the Constitution did not contemplate such a contingency as has now arisen and did not provide for it. provide for it.

If they had contemplated it, how easy it would have been to have pointed out the authority which should decide upon disputed electoral votes.

If they intended that a controversy as to the electoral votes should be decided by the President of the Senate, how readily they might have so declared. A very few words would have conferred that power and made it clear. It certainly was not so considered by the framers of the Constitution; for in the earlier elections, when some of them were yet in Congress, it does not appear that such authority was ex-

The Congress of the Confederation, on the 28th of September, 1787, in transmitting the new Constitution to the Legislatures of the States, resolved, among other things, that when nine States should have ratified it, it should go into operation, and that when Congress convened at the appointed time "the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President."

This was presessed because to Vice President had as not become

This was necessary because no Vice-President had as yet been de-clared elected; hence there was no President of the Senate, and it became necessary to have a President of the Senate pro tempore elected for the single purpose designated.

At the first election John Langdon, President of the Senate pro tempore, declared that he, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

This action was not considered a precedent for the future, as subsequent proceedings very fully show.

At the second election the certificates were opened, read, and delivered by the Vice-President to the tellers appointed for that purpose, who having examined and ascertained the votes presented a list of them to the Vice-President, which list was read to the two Houses.

From that time to the eighth election inclusive the minutes state that the Vice-President opened the certificates and handed them to the tellers, who examined and ascertained the votes, it not appearing that the Vice-President even performed the clerical duty of reading the votes as the certificates were opened, although it may be presumed

After the ninth election, in 1821, the monotony of opening the seals and counting the votes was varied by an objection to the vote of Missouri, made by Mr. Livermore, of New Hampshire, on the ground that Missouri was not yet a State in the Union and that her vote should not be counted. Over this question the President of the Senate did not assume authority, but the two Houses decided in advance how the the vote should be counted and announced.

After the thirteenth election, in 1837, a question concerning the admission of the votes of Michigan was raised, which was decided by the two Houses without any intervention of authority on the part of

At the fourteenth election the President of the Senate opened, and the tellers read, counted, and registered the votes, a merely clerical performance.

Following the fifteenth election, in 1845, the programme was varied again, and the President of the Senate handed the scaled packets of the votes of Maine and the other States to the tellers, who opened them and counted the votes.

In counting the votes at the eighteenth election, 1857, it was found that Wisconsin had cast her votes one day after the time prescribed in the Constitution. Her vote was counted. The President of the Senate seemed at first to have assumed the right to decide upon its legality, but afterward disclaimed such right. In the debate his right to decide was strenuously denied, and it was insisted upon by most of the speakers in both cases that his duties were merely ministerial, and that the power did not lie with him but with the two Houses, and the votes not requiring a decision to be made, it was left undecided. Preceding the counting of the votes of the twentieth election, in 1865, the twenty-second joint rule was adopted, which provided that "no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted, except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses."

This was a denial, upon the part of Congress, of any right in the President of the Senate to decide upon an electoral vote, and acquiesced in by him without remonstrance or opposition when the votes came in by him without remonstrance or opposition when the votes came to be counted.

Under that joint rule the vote of Louisiana, although objected to, was counted at the twenty-first election, and the votes of Georgia were counted with a qualified expression.

were counted with a qualified expression.

At the twenty-second election the votes of the States of Arkansas and Louisiana were excluded under the rule, the Houses thus declaring their power and excluding that of the President of the Senate over the determination of the contested votes of States.

From this statement it will be seen that from the origin of the present Union to this day the President of the Senate, when the admission of electoral votes was contested, never asserted a claim on his part to be the judge of the legality of such votes, but that in every instance Congress has asserted and maintained its right to decide upon the merits of the cases as they came before it.

It is an unbroken chain of action for ninety years in which the President of the Senate only acted as the presiding officer of the joint body and in a purely ministerial capacity in counting the votes, their legality being left to the Houses of Congress until the passage of the joint rule which gave an authority to either House to decide against the admission of votes which it believed to be illegal.

The early action of the revolutionary fathers was in consonance

The early action of the revolutionary fathers was in consonance with that doctrine.

The principle of law and equity and justice that a man shall not sit in judgment on his own case, when disputed, was as well known when the Constitution was framed as now.

the Constitution was framed as now.

When John Adams as Vice-President opened the certificates of votes that made him President, is it to be believed that if those votes had been contested that he was entitled to decide them in his favor? When Thomas Jefferson as Vice-President opened the certificates of votes which made him President, can it be argued that if there had been contested votes in certain States he could have thrown out those which were against him?

I cannot believe it, vet if we asked that the president of the certificates.

which were against him?

I cannot believe it; yet if we acknowledge that as President of the Senate they had a right to decide disputed questions of legality, they could not have been prevented from sitting in their own case, deciding in their own favor, and perhaps changing the whole policy of the Government against the wishes of the majority of the people, and against every principle of justice.

It would be to give a candidate for the highest office in the people's gift the right, in a close contest in certain cases, to declare himself elected.

The framers of the Constitution certainly did not intend to give to any man such a power in the presence of the representatives of the States and the people in joint convention assembled.

It is objected to this bill that it is a compromise and also uncon-

I do not so understand it. I am unable to see that it takes away from the electors, candidates, or from any department of the Govern-ment any of their rights, nor adds to Congress powers not granted by the Constitution.

Preceding the count of the electoral votes after every presidential election, the two Houses have adopted rules regulating that count, and provided for the admission or rejection of electoral votes.

That is all this bill does, except that it calls some of the wisest, best, and purest men in the country to aid Congress in the settlement of a disputed succession. Confronted with the great danger of embarrassment and confusion likely to result on a closely contested election and in the struggle for the possession of the powers and authority of a great nation, it has endeavored to form a tribunal as free from party bias as possible.

For its power to do this the committee looked to the Constitution.

That great charter was not intended to be an inelastic instrument incapable of expansion or contraction as the necessities of the people might require; but was intended to be what its terms purport, a Constitution under whose provisions laws might be made or repealed to suit the varying emergencies of the times and the wants of the to suit the varying emergencies of the times and the wants of the citizens. It could not anticipate every emergency that would arise from the growth and development of the nation; and hence it was that it gave to Congress power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

The extent of that power is happily defined by Chief-Justice Marshall in the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 413.

In that celebrated case it was decided that a discretionary power was ledged in Congress respecting the means which it might use to

In that celebrated case it was decided that a discretionary power was lodged in Congress respecting the means which it might use to carry its enumerated powers into execution. It was there said that if the ends were legitimate, and were within the scope of the Constitution, all means which were appropriate and plainly adapted to that end, which were not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

Under that decision the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States was declared.

Under that principle we purchased Louisiana, Florida, and Alaska; and under it Congress can exempt the national securities from State or national taxation.

The power to electa President is vested in the people under certain forms and restrictions, and is one of the greatest devolving upon the people. If Congress should deem it necessary to enact certain laws people. If Congress should deem it necessary to enact certain laws to elect that officer, and should think proper to prescribe certain rules to ascertain the people's will as expressed by their electoral votes, under that section, Congress certainly has the power to do it. So thought John Marshal, afterward the greatest Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, when in 1800, in Congress, he made a report and voted for a bill having for its object, as its title declared, "a mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States."

From that hill many of the features of the present hill are hor-from that bill many of the features of the present bill are borrowed, and if they were considered constitutional then, there is no reason why they should be deemed unconstitutional now.

If, however, there should be found no express authority in the Constitution for settling disputed presidential election cases, there must be a power somewhere to do it. It was not intended by the fathers that the nation should die of inanition.

By the tenth amendment "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are re-States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The Senate and House of Representatives sitting in joint convention on the electoral vote represent the States and the people, and if the power to preserve the Union from the struggles over a disputed succession can be found nowhere else, it can be found in that amendment. I hold, however, it is clearly to be found within the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution.

It is objected, however, that we submit the settlement of the presi-It is objected, however, that we submit the settlement of the presidential election to the arbitrament of a single individual, the fifth member of the Supreme Court. It is said that we cannot find members of Congress sufficiently free from party bias; that the judges are more or less partisan, and that the votes of the Senators and members of the House will be balanced, and that the judges chosen by the bill are equally divided in politics and that the judge they may choose will decide the question.

Such objectors forget that they propose to leave the decision of this important and delicate question to a single individual, a partisan President of the Senate.

tisan President of the Senate.

They confess that there is no tribunal in the land sufficiently honest and free from party bias to do what to right, justice, law, and equity belong. It is to say that we are so imbued with party spirit that political opponents can obtain no rights, however clearly shown, against the will of an opposite party. It is a melancholy charge to make, and I do not believe it true.

If the Supreme Court of the United States is not above the bias of If the Supreme Court of the United States is not above the bias of party spirit, I know not where independence of thought and action can be found. The judges hold a life tenure of office. They owe allegiance to no man and no party. They can afford to be independent of all. They are the highest court in this land, and the peers of any judicial tribunal in the world. They have a pride in keeping the purity of the ermine unsullied, and no advantage can be gained by them or the party with which they affiliate that would compensate them for giving a judgment that would be unwarranted by the law and the facts as they should be laid before them.

Having unbounded confidence in their judgment and in their purity of character and freedom from bias, I would cheerfully bow to their decision if on them the decision should eventually fall.

But what do the opponents of the bill offer to rescue the country from the impending danger? Nothing, absolutely nothing. They propose no substitute, they offer no alternative if this bill should fail. They will let us drift on into a convention composed of two Houses independent of each other and composed of determined and excited politicians of the two great, antagonistic national parties, all insisting that their favorite candidate is elected and that the disputed electoral votes should be counted in his favor, with no common arbiter to decide between contending claims. Their policy would lead to angry strife and noise and tumult, and the arousing of the most intense passions of the human heart to a perilous extent, perhaps to an irrepressible violence. haps to an irrepressible violence.

It means the plunging of the Government into confusion; it means a political disturbance and excitement of the people from one end of the Union to the other, with a corresponding disturbance of all their business interests and an awakening of a strife that it is fearful to eontemplate.

It is a drifting onward without chart, compass, or rudder into a great ocean of political uncertainty, whose angry waves may ingulf our republican institutions, the best hitherto framed for the progress and development of the civil and political rights of man.

On the other hand, the bill that is before us provides for a peaceable solution of the vexed question of the legality or illegality of the disputed electoral votes; it takes away unjustly from neither candidate for the Presidency his rights; it is constitutional in its terms and powers; and when it becomes a law the action under it will be acquiesced in by all the people of the nation and will cause the troubled waves of faction and political discontent to subside into the calmness of a summer sea. calmness of a summer sea calmness of a summer sea.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. Speaker, I desire as well as I can in the few moments I have to state some of the reasons why I shall be constrained to vote against this bill. For about ninety years the people of the United States have every four years held a presidential election. Twenty-two times in the history of our Government under the present Constitution the people have elected presidential electors. Twenty-two times have the electors assembled and voted. Twenty-two times have the certificates been opened and the votes been counted and the President and Vice President elected in a preparate and the machinery. President and Vice-President elected, inaugurated, and the machinery of the Government kept in constant motion. At no time, Mr. Speaker, during this long period which comprises the whole period of our constitutional history has a resort in a single instance been had to such an extraordinary and remarkable mode of ascertaining the result of a presidential election as is proposed in this bill. Indeed there is no precedent, and there has been nothing done in Congress or in either branch of Congress since we had a Congress that can properly be construed as a resolut for this reasonnee. strued as a precedent for this measure.

Only once in the history of the Government was it proposed even to pass a bill at all similar to the one now under consideration. That was in the year 1800. You will remember that the bill that was introduced in the Senate on that occasion proposed a commission to be composed of six members of the Senate and six members of the House composed of six members of the Senate and six members of the House with the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court to act as president of the commission. But one of the very first things done in the Senate upon the consideration of that bill was to strike out the Chief-Justice; and the bill as it passed the Senate had no element of the Supreme Court in it. The Chief-Justice was left out. No associate judge was to be placed upon that commission; and the commission was to be composed entirely and wholly of Senators and members of the House of Representatives. The bill came to the House, where it was on the 26th day of April, 1800, committed to a select committee of which John Marshall, of Virginia, was chairman.

Sir, I have heard gentlemen here invoke the great name of John Marshall and his great authority as recommending principles similar to those embraced in this bill. Mr. Speaker, when the bill to which gentlemen refer came into the House there was no Chief-Justice or associate justices of the Supreme Court named in it, and Mr. Marshall never recommended, never voted for, and never did anything in reference to constituting a commission composed in part of the judciary of the country. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, that bill as it passed the Senate made the decision of the commission final, as this bill practically does. Mr. Marshall questioned the propriety of this provision and recommended to the House that the bill ought to be modified in that respect, and so he reported the bill back to the House with that modification. He constituted a commission whose duty it should be that respect, and so he reported the bill back to the House with that modification. He constituted a commission whose duty it should be to take into consideration such questions as should be submitted to it and make a report thereon; and that report should contain only those memorials and petitions, depositions and testimony taken before the commission without even the opinion of the commission itself thereupon, and so that bill passed the House and so it was recommended by John Marshall. The commission so constituted was not allowed even to express an opinion upon the questions submitted to them. They were simply to take testimony and arrange and present to the House and the Senate the material upon which a decision might be made.

Now, I submit, that so far as anything can be learned from the ac-tion of that Congress upon that bill, that it condemns this measure. The Senate expressly refused to pass a bill that should drag the Supreme Court or Chief-Justice or any associate justice of the Supreme Court into the decision of a purely political question. And further, the House of Representatives, under the lead of John Marshall, that great man and great jurist, whose name has become a synonym for law and equity and justice and wisdom—the House of Representatives refused to pass the bill in such shape as to make the decision of the commission, composed as it was wholly of Senators and members of the House, binding. Ay, sir, they went further, and refused even to allow that commission to express an opinion upon the questions submitted. And one thing further: In all the forms of that bill, both as it passed the House and as it passed the Senate, there was always this provision in it, that the commission should at no time and under no circumstances go back to inquire into the appointment of electors for President and Vice-President. The bill stopped then before they reached that point. This bill does nothing of that sort. On the other hand, this bill confers upon this commission unlimited powers, which they are to construe for themselves. As the gentleman from Illinois well said, it is simply a quitclaim made of all the authority that Congress has, be it much or little or none, and the commission is to construe for itself and decide for itself how for the commission is to construe for itself and decide for itself how far

Now, here is a power, if this commission shall choose to exercise it, shall choose so to construe it, to go to any extent it may see fit. The bill in fact allows this commission to organize itself into a grand returning board with full power and full authority to revise the returns from every State from every county from every parish to go into turning board with full power and full authority to revise the returns from every State, from every county, from every parish, to go into every polling-district and there examine and see whether the election was fairly and properly held or not. You may say the commission will not do this. I do not suppose the commission will, but under the bill they have the power to do it, they havethe right to do it; and the rule which Congress has given them for ascertaining their powers will allow them to go to that extent, and of that they themselves are to be the sole judges.

In short, Mr. Speaker, my great objection to this measure is that it creates a tribunal unknown to the Constitution, with unlimited powers, and with the power of judging of the extent of its own authority, and makes it supreme upon that question. We have no such authority to grant, and if we had it would be unwise to grant it.

I object to the possession by this strangely constituted and novel involving the title to the executive chair of this nation.

I object to the possession by this strangely constituted and novel tribunal of these unlimited and revolutionary powers over questions involving the title to the executive chair of this nation.

This measure is a new departure in our political history. It is the assumption of a power not only not granted by the Constitution, but which is directly opposed to the theory and spirit of the Constitution; a power of threatening import and of revolutionary tendency, because it will have the effect to bring every step in the election of a President under the immediate control of Congress. The Constitution denies to Congress any control over or interference with the elections of a President by the people. The only directions which Congress can give the people on this subject is to fix the time when they shall vote for electors. The only directions Congress can give the electors is to fix the time when they shall vote for President and Vice-President.

But this bill contemplates inquiries beyond these limits of congress.

But this bill contemplates inquiries beyond these limits of congres ional control; it arms the commission of fifteen with authority over questions entirely within the jurisdiction of the States, and proposes to invade the domain of State action from which Federal authority has been carefully excluded.

There is no limitation to the powers of this commission. It is the do what it will, and is practically responsible to nobody. When once organized it cannot be dissolved or controlled.

Mr. Speaker, the creation of such a tribunal cannot but have a dangerous and revolutionary tendency. For one I will not be responsi-ble for the consequences that may result from it. The only safety for this country is in a faithful observance of the constitutional limitations of power and a strict adherence to constitutional limitations of power and a strict adherence to constitutional forms and methods of procedure. To cut loose from these moorings of the Constitution is to embark upon the wild sea of party fury and violence, in the darkness of the tempest, and with chance at the helm.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I yield one minute to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I have asked the gentleman from Maryland to yield to me to allow me to have read the telegram which I send to the Clerk's desk, and which I have just received from Raleigh: The Clerk read as follows:

RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA, January 26, 1877.

Gen. R. B. VANCE, House of Representatives:

Resolutions approving the joint committee's bill just passed both houses of our egislature; almost unanimously.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, a disputed presidential election has been predicted by eminent writers on the Constitution as the question which would most severely test that instrument and be the rock on which would most severely test that instrument and be the rock on which our form of government would probably be wrecked. The American people are at this time, on the threshold of the second century of our existence as a nation, confronted with the greatest danger to our institutions and the peace of the country by the disputed and varying interpretations of the provisions of the Constitution in regard to the counting or manner of counting and the authority to count or reject the electoral votes of the States for President and

While I hold decided views on this grave and all-important subject of dispute between the two great parties lately arrayed on the question of the choice of the highest executive officers of the Government tion of the choice of the highest executive officers of the Government and which parties are now in irreconcilable hostility as to the result of the election, I must admit that others, with equal opportunities to ascertain the issue of the late peaceable contest, are of an opinion directly opposed to the views which I and the great political party which receives my support entertain. This antagonism of opinion not only exists as to the result of the election, but also as to the constitutional authority to decide that result.

At no time in the history of the Republic has the public mind been equally excited and inflamed. A large majority of the people not confined to party lines is firmly convinced that the leaders of one of the political parties have determined to maintain their opinion and to in-political parties have determined to maintain their opinion and to inaugurate as President their candidate without due submission to the augurate as President their candidate without due submission to the authority which the other great party asserts has the constitutional right to determine who has been elected President, or whether a majority of the electoral votes have been cast for either candidate.

It is impossible to estimate the consequences which may result from this attempt, if it be unsuccessful. So revolutionary a proceeding, judged by the lights of history, would inevitably lead to the destruction of the constitutional liberties of the people, which would perish mid the flames of an internecine struggle of arms. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen may refuse to admit any apprehension of such a result, and delusively deride any such statements as threats and menaces of resistance to the Government, but the inquiry remains to be deterresistance to the Government, but the inquiry remains to be determined whether the success of such a movement would make its authors and supporters the administrators of the Government, or if the House of Representatives should have under its authority, and in obedience to the Constitution, elected another person President he would not be clothed with full authority to act as the Executive of the Republic.

Now, Mr. Speaker, who is so arrogant as to say that in the not improbable case I have stated no danger can occur, and that they who probable case I have stated no danger can occur, and that they who patriotically warn this House of the imminent peril of a dual executive speak in the spirit of bluster and deserve the swift scorn and indignation of the people, as oracularly asserted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar.] No, sir; it is the consciousness of this peril, of these grave apprehensions of civil strife, that has moved the whole people to besiege Congress with petitions and prayers to ward off this danger by the passage of this bill now pending before

The voice of the people, speaking as it was never heard in any previous crisis of our country's history, is a command to their Representatives to yield their individual or party opinions, and to offer them as a sacrifice, an oblation on the altar of their country, for the peace and welfare of the whole country.

Mr. Speaker, I respect the voice of the people; there is majesty and dignity in the patriotic and unselfish desire of the country for peace. can only be secured by a decision of the late presidential election It can only be secured by a decision of the late presidential election which will guarantee to the occupant of the presidential office that he is not regarded as a usurper by a majority of the people. In this view, Mr. Speaker, and without yielding in any sense any of my well-considered opinions as to the right of Congress to count the electoral vote and the authority and power of the House of Representatives to determine when the contingency arises when under the Constitution it shall elect the President, I shall vote for the bill now pending before the House, believing that in its provisions it contravenes in no respect the Constitution, and indulging the hope that right and justice will be maintained by the commission which is empowered to provisionally determine the graveisones of law and of fact confided to provisionally determine the grave issues of law and of fact confided to its inrisdiction.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, the proposition which the joint committee, composed of wise and patriotic members of both Houses, and of the two great political parties, commend to Congress and the country as an olive branch of peace is not the offspring of partisan zeal or bias, but is the thoughtful and mature plan of escape from this dead-lock of conflicting authorities. In my judgment, it has been made to conform to the requirements of the Constitution and the laws in pursuance thereof and in strict deference to the equal rights of both contestants. It is true that some well-thinking persons, while anxious to avoid the terrible results to which this contest may lead, nevertheless express grave doubts as to the constitutionality of the gress are often general, for it was impossible for the framers of the Constitution to prescribe special powers to meet every emergency in the progress of Government. Such foresight and prescience is not allowed to humanity. And there is no better established doctrine than that where the Constitution enjoins any of its agents to perform than that where the Constitution enjoins any of its agents to perform an act, it ipso facto confers the power to do so. It is the sole judge of the manner in which that power is exercised. Nothing is said in the Constitution of the manner or how the act is to be performed. It is only ordered that it be done, and Congress is at liberty to choose its own mode of doing so. It might call to its aid any other agencies if it desired to do so, as to that matter. It, however, has selected ten of its own members and five judges of the Supreme Bench, and they with power to select a fifth. Who more just or wise or patriotic? All acting as judges under oath to decide according to the Constitution and the laws this great dispute that now rocks the country to and fro like a drunken man. a drunken man.

Why, sir! I venture to assert that the Senators and Representatives who will be chosen as members of this grand commission, feeling the weight of the immense responsibility with which they are clothed, that of arbitrating upon the rights and interests of forty-five millions of people—aye, of arbitrating upon the rights and interests of the unborn millions who are to come after us, will rise them the theories of politicians and the precipion of the properties of the control of the above the theories of politicians and the prejudices of the partisans, and, guided by their enlightened consciences, administer the Constitution and the laws fearlessly and sacredly. And to suppose for a moment that of the other part of the commission, those whose daily habit and profession are to hold evenly the scales of justice between their fellow-men, they would act otherwise, would be swayed a particle from the line of duty by the surging power of party passion, is itself an impeachment of their integrity, even by insinuation, which if true utterly disqualifies them for the honorable office they now hold true utterly disqualities them for the honorable office they now hold with the admiration of the American people.

And if the judgment of this high commission does not meet the approval of Congress then it is rejected. If it meets its approval then it becomes its own act. Where, then, is there any abdication of its constitutional powers or privileges?

I believe that the bill of the committee is entirely free from constitutional objections and that this House has abdicated no right or power whatever in this great political drama. If it is contended that the House should have waited until the 14th of February, the time fixed for counting the vote, and, if both Houses did not concur in the fixed for counting the vote, and, if both Houses did not concur in the counting and reach a conclusion satisfactory to it, then that it should immediately proceed to choose from the three highest candidates, I may be allowed to answer that the way is not clear for the House so may be allowed to answer that the way is not clear for the House so to proceed, because the work of counting might not be complete and until it is complete no failure to elect is declared. Suppose the Senate ask for time to deliberate shall the House refuse it and declare for itself that a failure to elect by the electoral college has occurred. If the Senate be equal with the House in the power to count, is not its opinion and right to declare whether there is a failure to elect just as weighty and authoritative as that of the House? That being true what an obstacle is there in the path of the House? what an obstacle is there in the path of the House. In 1800 and in 1824, when the House of Representatives elected the President, it was done in each case by both Houses concurring that there was no election by the college. And should the House believe that an election has been made by the people and the college, then its power to elect at all is at an end, for it can elect only when there has been a failure by the people.

The duty of the House to proceed to choose from between the three highest candidates, when no election by the people or by the electoral college has been effected, cannot be denied. The language of the Constitution will not admit of a doubt upon that point. And when that stage of the proceeding has been reached the House does not need to be told by the Senate to proceed to the exercise of that high constitutional prerogative. But the question is, when does the failure to elect occur? As it requires the assent of both Houses to announce an election, may it not require the assent of both Houses to announce an election, may it not require the assent of both Houses to declare a failure of an election? Suppose that in case that the Senate should conscientiously believe that an election had been made by the college and suppose the House did not believe it. Here is an affirmative and a negative proposition directly conflicting, and both emanating from an authority of equal weight, power, and dignity.

Now, without any adjustment of these conflicting views, without some agency erected by the separate yet concurrent action of both Houses, the two together retaining the right of a veto, which shall be anxious to avoid the terrible results to which this contest may lead, nevertheless express grave doubts as to the constitutionality of the measure. They seem to think that it involves a delegation of the powers and duties of Congress.

The Constitution has enjoined upon Congress the duty to count the electoral votes for President and Vice-President. Congress consists of two Houses of equal powers. Each House has its own opinion, differing from the other. What do they by this bill? They agree separately to enact a law which shall bind them both to a certain mode of counting the vote; that is, they agree separately to act conjointly. In the separate action of each House no restraint or coercion or denial of constitutional power is forced upon that body. Its action is voluntary. It is within the power of Congress to adopt whatever mode it chooses to perform the duty of counting. Each House adopts the plan of this tripartite commission, and it becomes the month-piece of Congress. Congress, however, reserves the right to reject the result of its labors. The power is a general one. Indeed the powers of Con-ous and tyrannical to assert that the Senate should authorize its presiding officer to count the votes and declare the result independent siding officer to count the votes and declare the result independent of the rights or the opinions of the House of Representatives. It is plain that the Constitution does not anticipate or provide for the independent action of either House contrary to the will of the other in the process of counting. I am not speaking of the right of each House to withdraw for deliberation. The Constitution has provided for the harmonious co-operation of both Houses of Congress, and any self-willed and defiant action upon the part of either House against the consent of the other would hardly escape being an act of revolution.

But in this case the Senate thinks one way and the House thinks another way, and, both with equal powers, the problem then becomes difficult and blinding. Under such circumstances, a part of the people would hold that for either House to attempt the declaration of the election of either candidate would be revolutionary, and anarchy

What is our duty? Shall each persist in its own course regardless of the opinions of the other until the country finds itself with a dual Presidency? In such a case who is to be obeyed? How long would two persons, one backed by the Senate and one of the great political parties, and the other backed by the House of Representatives and the other great party, both attempting to assume the authority and perform the functions of Chief Magistrate of this country—how long before they would each attempt to enforce his authority at the point of the bayonet? That would be war. Shall we have war if it can be honorably avoided? It is the last argument of nations and of neonles.

The two great parties, with their leaders, now stand face to face, like two huge giants, snarling at each other. Shall we who are intrusted with those sacred and mighty interests perform an act of patriotism, justice, and wisdom, and quiet these opposing forces by the adoption of this great measure of pacification, or shall we dogmatically stickle with special pleas over our own dogmas and thus widen the breach until the sword shall become the arbiter? God forbid such a conclusion! I turn my eyes from such a picture. There are but two things worse than civil war; they are slavery and national disgrace. Neither alternative is possible under the beneficent provisions of this bill.

The responsibility imposed by the Constitution in this grave crisis upon each Senator and Representative admits of no evasion, but The two great parties, with their leaders, now stand face to face,

The responsibility imposed by the Constitution in this grave crisis upon each Senator and Representative admits of no evasion, but must be bravely met. I have been an advocate of this proposition from the date of its adoption by the joint committee, not because I prefer it to the usual mode of procedure, which has been uniformly adopted in the matter of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, but because of the failure of the two Houses to concur in a joint rule, the Senate having arbitrarily abrogated the twenty-second joint rule, and because I believe that under this plan the substantial ends of justice may be obtained. More than that; the sacred interests of the people of the United States demand at my hands my best efforts under the circumstances for their protection. The call of patriotism, the cry of humanity, the earnest appeal for peace which millions of hearts offer, unite in demanding of this Congress some measure of just settlement of this vexed issue. That this peace which millions of hearts offer, unite in demanding of this Congress some measure of just settlement of this vexed issue. That this in all its constituents meets the approval of any one of its advocates and supporters may be problematical, but who can present a better plan that can surely claim the sanction of Congress? For my part no question of doubtful expediency, but a positive constitutional inhibition could drive me to vote against this measure, so nearly does this country verge upon anarchy or something worse, if, indeed, there be a worse fate for a people once governed by law.

The vast and important stake which baffles the conceptions of the beldest imagination, and now belancing as upon a privet upon our boldest imagination, and now balancing as upon a pivot upon our action upon this bill, appeals to our calm and thoughtful consideration, to the peace of our firesides, and to our loyalty to posterity. Our people everywhere have begun to speak. Their necessity is our opportunity. Their flat is that the voice of reason must rise above the people everywhere have begun to speak. Their necessity is our opportunity. Their fiat is that the voice of reason must rise above the din of passion and genuine patriotism must take the place of party. Political theories and platforms must give way when they endanger the existence of the country, and the Constitution must sway its scepter of justice and equality over all and for all, no matter who stands or falls.

Mr. PAYNE, (at four o'clock.) I withdraw the motion to recommit and call the previous question upon ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may offer an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not object to its being read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 1, line 13, insert the word "and" between the words "opened" and "pre sented," and strike out the words "and acted upon."

In line 33 strike out the words "a State" and insert "any of the States."

In line 78 of section 2, after the word "same," insert "together with all the testimony relative to the recent presidential election in said State, which has been taken under the authority of either House of Congress, so far as the same may by the said commission be considered competent and relevant."

In section 2, line 92, strike out all after the word "forthwith" to and including the word "govern" in line 96, and insert "provided such decision shall be concurred in by both Houses of Congress."

Section 2, line 16, strike out all after the word "who" to and including the word "provided" in line 18.

Strike out all in lines from 21 to 29, both inclusive.

Strike out, commencing in line 49, all after the word "commission" to and including line 59.

Strike out the word "commission" wherever it occurs in the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the words "joint committee."

Mr. PAYNE. I decline to yield to allow that amendment to be offered. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I would like to offer an amendment.

[Cries of "O, no!" "Regular order!"]

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered which was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. PAYNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider e laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] is now entitled to an hour to close the debate.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr.WALKER.]

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, many of the leading business men among the patriotic constituency I have the honor to represent in this House met the other evening in Richmond and in a few well-chosen words (which I will append to my remarks) heartily indorsing the pending measure requested my active and cordial support of it. Did I not entirely agree with them in sentiment upon this measure, could I not cheerfully and conscientiously obey their behests, I should promptly resign my position and return to them the trust which they had generously and confidently committed to my keeping. But, sir, in this instance the Representative and his constituents are in a happy and earnest accord. They no more anxiously desire his support of this bill than he from profound conviction renders it. I am indebted to the generosity of him who I am proud to call my friend (Mr. PAYNE, of Ohio, chairman of the committee) for an opportunity to briefly state some of the reasons which have produced my convictions.

The consideration of this bill naturally suggests two queries: Is it

The consideration of this bill naturally suggests two queries: Is it

The consideration of this bill naturally suggests two queries: Is it lawful? Is it necessary? Unless each member of this House can respond affirmatively to both of these queries, duty to himself, his country, and his God demands that he should vote against it.

Three questions will be affirmatively established by the enactment of this measure into a law: First, that the power to count the electoral votes for President and Vice-President is vested by the Constitution in the two Houses of Congress; second, that no electoral vote can be rejected without the concurrent action of both Houses of Congress; and third that Congress has the power to delegate to a compress and third that Congress has the power to delegate to a comgress; and, third, that Congress has the power to delegate to a commission the ascertainment, subject to its revision, of the true constitutional electoral vote of a State when more than one and different electoral certificates have been deposited with the President of the Sen-

Of the first question it would seem a sufficient answer to any cavil to the contrary that the uniform and unbroken line of precedents from the foundation of the Republic to the present time completely establishes it. But suppose it were an original question, unillumed by the judgment of patriots and statesmen for nearly an entire cenby the judgment of patriots and statesmen for nearly an entire century, and that we were called upon now for the first time to interpret the Constitution in this behalf, could a reasonable question be raised as to the meaning of it? "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted," is the language of the Constitution. Now, to plain and honest people who are in the habit of interpreting language according to its evident intent and without casuistry or special pleading the question naturally arises, if the framers of the Constitution intended that the President of the Senate should count the votes as well as once the certificates, why wholed cashistry or special pleading the question naturally arrises, if the framers of the Constitution intended that the President of the Senate should count the votes as well as open the certificates, why did they not say so? No instrument in the English language is so celebrated for the perspicuity and exactness of style as our Constitution. Not an ambiguous word or sentence can be found in it. Its fashioners did not use words like Tallyrand, to conceal ideas, but rather to express them. By the plain and obvious intent of the Constitution, the sole and only duty of the President of the Senate is to receive and safely keep the certificates of the electoral votes and then at the appointed day to open them in the presence of the two Houses of Congress for their consideration and action. When to this plain and natural construction of the language of the Constitution is added the history of its adoption, together with its uniform interpretation by every official body which has acted upon it, all of which I have carefully examined, it is matter of profound astonishment to me how any intelligent mind can entertain a contrary opinion. In my judgment, after the discussions upon this bill, no man will ever have the hardihood to urge an adverse doctrine. I shall treat it as finally and forever settled, no matter what may be the fate of this bill, and pass on to the consideration of the second proposition, namely, that no electoral vote can be rejected without the concurrent action of both Houses of Congress.

both Houses of Congress.

The chameleon character of the views of some gentlemen upon this question are amusing if not instructive. What, reject the votes of a sovereign State by Congress even if both Houses do concur! they or a sovereign state by Congress even it both houses do content they exclaim with much apparent warmth and indignation. The proposition is monstrous, say they, and is directly in conflict with the Constitution. How long is it since this revelation of constitutional light first dawned upon their enraptured visions? How long is it since they held and acted upon the doctrine that even one House could disfranchise a State? Who enacted the twenty-second joint rule, which placed the control of the electoral vote of any and every State of the Union in a single branch of Congress?

The doctrine of State rights seems to have received a new baptism and entered upon a new career of grace and glory in the light of present contingencies and future possibilities. But, sir, this newborn zeal for the rights of the States in the breasts of their hereditary and inveterate foes finds no check or hinderance to its full bloom and and inveterate fees finds no check of ininderance to its full bloom and refreshing fragrance in this proposition. It simply provides that the vote of no State shall be rejected except upon the concurrent vote of both Houses. What infringement of the rights of the States is this? It is not to be presumed that the vote of any State will be rejected by both Houses, representing as they do in their respective capacities the sovereignty of both the people and the several States, except upon the sovereignty of both the people and the several States, except upon the ground that the vote rejected is not the constitutional vote of the State. This is at once the extent and limit of the power. In other words, Congress cannot disfranchise a State though a State may disfranchise itself. Electors of each State are to be appointed "in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct;" but suppose that no provision be made by the Legislature for the appointment of electors, or that the certificate of appointment be false, fraudulent, or forged, will any one contend that nevertheless the vote of that State shall be counted? This bill does not even declare that such votes shall be be counted? This bill does not even declare that such votes shall be rejected. It simply says that they shall not be rejected except by the concurrent vote of the two Houses. Beyond ascertaining whether the Legislature has made provision for the appointment of electors and that the appointments have been made in accordance with such provision, and that the other provisions of the Constitution as to time of appointment, time of meeting, and character of electors, the power of Congress does not extend. But even the exercise of this power is not provided for by this bill. That the vote of a State will be rejected at all is a mere negative inference. It simply provides that even for these reasons no vote shall be rejected except by the con-current vote of both Houses. Does any one question that Congress possesses this power under the Constitution independent of and without any statutory provision?

Is there no form, no instrumentality by which can be ascertained whether electors have been constitutionally appointed or not? Surely there is no such casus omissus as this in that great charter of our liberties which we have been taught to venerate from our childhood. Scarcely any provision of the Constitution is self-executing. It is a nicely though simply adjusted piece of mechanism, but it cannot move until life be breathed into it through the legislative power, and the exercise of this power is amply provided for in the last clause of the first article of the Constitution, which declares that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

States, or in any department or officer thereof."

The legislative function, which is brought into play in the counting of the electoral votes, also in my judgment authorizes the employment of the means prescribed by this bill to aid Congress in ascertaining the constitutional vote of a State when the certificates of more than one set of electors are deposited with the President of the Senate.

The finding of the tribunal must be satisfactory to Congress or else

Congress reserves the right to reverse it will not be allowed to stand. Congress reserves the right to reverse its action in all cases. In fact the commission is simply a means employed by Congress to enable it to properly discharge its functions in counting the vote. It is not an arbitration, nor yet is it a court of dernier ressort; it is simply an imposing advisory board, composed of eminent jurists and statesmen, charged by Congress with certain grave and responsible duties, but subject to its supervision and congrave and responsible duties, but subject to its supervision and control. And if Congress has the right to count the electoral votes and determine what are lawful and constitutional, then clearly it is clothed with undoubted power to employ the best and the safest means to enable it to discharge that duty. What better or more appropriate means could be devised than the commission provided for in this bill? Who doubts that it will be as fair and just a tribunal as frail human nature could under the circumstances devise? The man who, accepting a membership of this august body and swearing before high heaven to hear and decide the subjects submitted to him according to the to hear and decide the subjects submitted to him according to the Constitution and laws, should then allow his judgment to be warped by partisan zeal or unholy and selfish motives, would be damned to Should its deliberations result in the inauguration of Governor Hayes as President, he will at least be conscious that he holds his lofty position in defiance of the popular will and in the face of the solemn protest of a majority of his countrymen, amounting to nearly solemn protest of a majority of his countrymen, amounting to hearly a quarter of a million of votes; yes, and of a majority of his own race amounting to fully 900,000 votes. But if, on the contrary, its findings should result in the inauguration of Governor Tilden as President, a consummation devoutly to be wished, then indeed would joy supreme reign throughout the land. Then would be inaugurated the era of "good feeling," the era of real peace and genuine prosperity. From many a stately mansion and humble hamlet will go up the cry:

Now is the winter of our discontent Made glorious summer by this sun of York; And all the clouds, that low'rd upon our house, In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.

But, sir, whatever the result may be the American people will bow before it in respectful obedience. Salus populi suprema lex. The safety of the people also demands submission to lawful decrees. I favor the measure in no partisan spirit. Every one of us should realize that this is no mare properties of expedience or selfest textice. this is no mere question of expediency or selfish tactics. No, sir, it rises high above all these and into the lofty plane of sublime and disinterested patriotism. The national life is imperiled, and in the presence of the momentous danger partisanship pales into loathsome insignificance.

Sir, the agitations by political parties, like those of the ocean, are ander our system of popular government essential to purity and healthfulness. They conduce by the agitation and discussion of important questions to correct and patriotic conclusions and action, while blind partisanship is the bane of free government. "It matters not blind partisanship is the bane of free government. "It matters not how high may roll the waves of partisan fury, so long as parties keep aloof from faction. Let the altar on which the fire of their zeal is kindled be the altar of principle; let it be fed by the pure oil of patriotism, and let the vestal guardians, liberty and law, watch over their embers; they shall not die."

Sir, the scene which we are enacting is one of the grandest ever witnessed on the world's great stage, and by its light generations yet unborn will guide their action. Magna Charta set bounds to royal prerogative, the Petition of Right enforced the freedom of the subject, and the Bill of Rights superadded to and became the complement of and the Bill of Rights superadded to and became the complement of both. These three great bulwarks of English liberty were but the pre-cursors, the prototypes of our immortal Declaration of Independence. With what reverence do we bow before these great landmarks of Anglo-Saxon freedom! And yet none of them in their day and gen-Angio-Saxon freedom? And yet none or them in their day and generation were scarcely more important than the measure now under consideration. These in the main were but the declarations of the rights and liberties of the people, while this is a measure which has for its object the conservation of those rights and liberties. Its adoption will silence partisan clamor and selfish agitation. Peace will spread its benignant wings over our favored Republic; happiness, safety, and prosperity will again gladden the hearts of the American people. Poverty that now stalks your streets in search of work or bread people. Poverty, that now stalks your streets in search of work or bread, will be employed. Your silent work-shops and your stagnant commerce will be revived, health will supersede disease, and activity stagnation.

"Peace, be still!" was the sovereign mandate of the Saviour of mankind to the storm-tossed sea before Capernaum. Above the din and roar of the tempest the angry waters heard the voice of their God and sank into subdued silence. Calm succeeded turmoil and the Galilean fishermen moored their frail bark in a port of safety. So high above the tumultuous and angry waves of political excitement and partisan zeal shall be heard the potential and almost unanimous voice of this Congress uttered through this sovereign measure of good; they shall be hushed into silence; the ark of our covenant, wherein are centered our lives and fortunes, our highest hopes and loftiest aspirations, shall be rescued from impending danger and once more antions, shall be rescued from impending danger and once more anchored in the broad haven of universal peace and domestic concord. Then indeed may the poet of our times chant again that hymn sung

MEETING OF BUSINESS MEN OF RICHMOND JANUARY 22, 1877.

In response to a call published in the papers yesterday morning a large number of representative business men assembled at Association Hall yesterday evening at five o'clock to discuss the report of the joint committee on the counting of the electroral vote.

Mr. John Purcell said he had been delegated to nominate General Anderson as chairman of the meeting, and he accordingly did so. General Anderson was unanimously elected.

A COMMITTEE OF TWENTY.

Mr. John Purcell moved that a committee of twenty be appointed to prepare suitable resolutions. Agreed to. The following were appointed: John Purcell. Isaac Davenport, Thomas Potts, Stephen Putney, Frank T. Glasgow, Andrew L. Ellett, Thomas W. McCanee, P. C. Warwick, Phil. Haxall, W. J. Yarbrough, C. H. Talcott, S. M. Rosenbaum, E. O. Nolting, Dr. J. P. Garnett, E. C. Barksdale, Robert S. Archer, John L. Bacon, James R. Crenshaw, Franklin Stearns.

Mr. Purcell, from the committee of twenty, submitted the following: THE RESOLUTIONS.

The citizens of Richmond, assembled in conformity with the call of a public meeting, deem it becoming that suitable expression shall be given to their opinion upon the bill lately reported by the joint committee of the Congress of the United States, by which a method is provided whereby Congress can ascertain and declare the result of the late presidential election.

In consequence of the long-continued and perilous uncertainty which has surrounded this question, trade and commerce have lessened and languished, the great manufacturing industries are in a state of suspended animation, labor pleads in vain for the rewards of honest toil, and agriculture, the "unursing mother" of every material interest and enterprise, shares the general discontent and provocation should lend additional acrimony to the contention which political controversy always engenders, and that the country stands now threatened either by a violent internecine strife, or by the danger of arousing that fierce and vindictive spirit which may flow from a sense of injury inflicted by lawless power. In this trying emergency the wise and patriotic will hall with profound satisfaction any mode of adjustment which does not violate the fundamental principles upon which our Government rests; and therefore when a body composed of some of the ablest and truest and bravest from each political party in the Congress of the United States has reported a scheme of settlement such as the bill referred to contains, it is entitled to careful and respectful consideration, and should, unless there be cardinal and insuperable objections to it, be gladly welcomed as the harbinger of peace and prosperity. We do not believe it liable to such objection and hence we approve and commend it.

Therefore, confidently trusting to the adoption of the measure and believing it.

Therefore, confidently trusting to the adoption of the measure, and believing it will result in the restoration of harmony, the revival of business, and a development of the great resources of the country until peace and plenty shall overspread the whole land:

Be it resolved. That we respectfully request Hon. GILBERT C. WALKER, the Repsentative from this district, to give to the bill his active and cordial support. The report was adopted with only two dissenting voices.

Mr. PAYNE. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Law-RENCE,] for ten minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, who shall count the electoral votes? What votes shall be counted? Shall they be counted on the record evidence of authenticity provided by the Constitution and laws in pursuance thereof, or shall the count be controlled by evidence and be affected by the opinions of a tribunal all unknown to and unprovided for by the Constitution? These are the questions which now claim the attention of Congress and engross the public mind. For the first time in our history, and within the last sixty days, the novel and startling proposition has been made that the votes are not to be counted on the record evidence of authenticity sanctioned by the Constitution, and sanctified by the approval of our entire history, but by the two Houses of Congress, and on such evidence as they and they "only" shall "prescribe." If they decide upon common rumor or newspaper statements that the vote of a State is for one set of electors when the legally authenticated record evidence affirms it is for another, this highest evidence known to the law may be rejected and the great seal of a State may be treated as a nullity, and as the and the great seal of a State may be treated as a nullity, and as the evidence of falsehood. If this doctrine had not received the support of distinguished names, and been followed up by committees of Congress gravely calling witnesses who have been permitted to offer as evidence matters which would be rejected on like inquiries by every judicial tribunal in the civilized world, it would not seem to deserve serious consideration.

But the occasion has become too grave for silence, and I shall en-deavor to show that this new doctrine has no sanction in the Constitution; that it is fraught with dangers to the Republic, with great evil and that continually; that those votes only can be counted which come with the record evidence of authenticity required by the Constitution and laws in pursuance thereof, and on this evidence alone; that the bill now pending to regulate the count, and which looks to inquiries outside of this record evidence, is unconstitutional and per-nicious; and that the Constitution has vested the power to count in the President of the Senate, and his authority cannot be divested by law or transferred to any other tribunal.

The material provisions of the Constitution which relate to these inquiries are the following:

PROVISIONS OF CONSTITUTION.

inquiries are the following:

PROVISIONS OF CONSTITUTION.

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and together with the Vice-President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.—Article 2, section 1.

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shal

LAWS OF CONGRESS.

Congress has legislated upon the subject of electoral votes by repeated acts, and among other provisions has enacted thatpeated acts, and among other provisions has enacted that—

The electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed, in each State, on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, in every fourth year succeeding every election of a President and Vice-President.—March 1, 1792, ch. 8, § 1, vol. 1, p. 239; January 23, 1845, ch. 1, vol. 5, p. 721.

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required to meet.—Act March 1, 1792, ch. 8, § 3, vol. 1, p. 240.

Each State may, by law, provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.—Act January 23, 1845.

The electors for each State shall meet and give their votes upon the first Wednesday in December in the year in which they are appointed, at such place, in each State, as the Legislature of such State shall direct.—Act March 1, 1792.

Congress shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, and the certificates, or so many of them as have been received, shall then be opened, the votes counted, and the persons to fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared, agreeably to the Constitution.—Act March 1, 1792.

MATERIAL FACTS AS TO ELECTORAL VOTES.

MATERIAL FACTS AS TO ELECTORAL VOTES.

All the States have made provision for the appointment by vote of the qualified voters in each of the required electors of President and Vice-President. In every State of the Union the proper vote for electors was taken on the 7th day of November, 1876. In each of the States of Oregon, Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina two sets of persons assuming to act as electors, on the first Wednesday, being the 6th day of December, 1876, cast votes, one set for Hayes and Wheeler, and one set for Tilden and Hendricks for President and Vice-President.

The persons assuming to vote as electors for Tilden and Hendricks in Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina neither held any certificate of election from the proper governor nor were they declared elected by the proper board of officers authorized to ascertain and declare who was duly appointed.

They held no evidence of title to the office of elector required either by the act of Congress or by State laws.

The electoral vote of each of these three States was cast for Hayes and Wheeler by electors holding the proper certificates of election of the governor, and who, besides, were declared elected by the proper board of State canvass

If time permits, I will speak of the vote of Oregon hereafter. The lists of votes cast by the electors in all the States have been The lists of votes cast by the electors in all the States have been forwarded to the President of the Senate. As the law now stands, it is the duty of the Senate and House of Representatives to assemble together "on the second Wednesday (being the 14th) of February," in order that the certificates of the votes cast by the electors may be opened, the votes counted, and "the persons to fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared agreeably to the Constitution." Constitution."

In and out of this Hall those who in the election of November supported Mr. Tilden for President universally concede that if the electoral vote of Oregon, Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina is to be counted for General Hayes, he will have 185 votes, which is a majority of one, and so he will be elected President.

Since the recent investigation by a committee of this House as to the election in South Carolina, I do not understand there is any dispute but that its vote is for Hayes.

If I may judge of the tone of the discussions in Congress, it would seem to be substantially conceded that there is no room for real controversy over the electoral vote of Florida or Oregon; these are for Hayes and Wheeler. If it were proper to inquire upon evidence, I entertain no doubt from all that has appeared in various forms that if there could have been in all the States a free and fair vote, at least three other States would have given their electoral vote for Hayes and Wheeler.

But it is assumed that the electoral vote cast in Louisiana for Hayes and Wheeler in the form prescribed by law, by electors holding the evidence of election prescribed by law and returned to the President of the Senate in the forms prescribed by law, may, in the count of electoral votes required by the Constitution, be rejected upon evidence taken by committees of Congress, and that instead of these there may be counted votes east by persons assuming to be electors without any evidence of title to the office prescribed by law.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. FIELD,] in an opinion which he has given to the public, referring to this question, says:

To learn what those electoral votes are, we are referred to a certificate, and told that we cannot go behind it. * * *

Further on he proceeds to say:

I do not believe that such is the law. * * In the absence of express enactments to the contrary, any judge may inquire into any fact necessary to his judgment. The point to be adjudged and declared in the present case is, who has received a majority of the electoral votes; that is, of valid electoral votes; not who has received a majority of certificates. A President is to be elected, not by a preponderance of certification, but by a preponderance of voting. The certificate is not the fact to be proved, but evidence of the fact, and one kind of evidence may be overcome by other and stronger evidence, unless some positive law declares that the weaker shall prevail over the stronger, the false over the true.

Let him therefore who asserts that the certificate of a returning heard cannot be

Let him, therefore, who asserts that the certificate of a returning board cannot be assered by any number of living witnesses to the contrary, show that positive law which makes it thus unanswerable. There is certainly nothing in the Consti-tution of the United States which makes it so, and there is no act of Congress to that effect.

If what has been said be founded in sound reason, the two Houses of Congress, when inquiring what votes are to be counted, have the right to go behind the certificate of any officers of a State to ascertain who have and who have not been appointed electors. The evidence which these Houses will record upon such inquiry it is for them, and them only, to prescribe.—Appleton's Book on Presidential Counts.

He proceeds again to say:

If there be danger in our present condition Congress can remove the danger. There are various ways of doing it. One is to provide for a judicial committee of the two Houses to sit in judgment as if they were judges and pronounce upon the result of the evidence.

The other gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] said in his speech of January 20:

We have the power; it is our duty to go behind returns, to tear down all barriers which interpose between the people and their rightful choice.

THE ELECTORAL-VOTE BILL.

It is in view of the facts which I have stated and the doctrines thus proclaimed as law that a select committee of the House and a House and a similar committee of the House and a similar committee of the Senate, acting in concert, reported to the two Houses on the 19th of January a bill "(H. R. No. 4454) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877."

The committee in the report accommendation the bill series of the bill series and the bill series of the bill series and the bill series are the bill series and the bill series and the bill series are the bill series are the bill series and the bill series are the bill se

The committee in the report accompanying the bill say:

The substance of the bill embraces—

First. Provisions for the meeting of the two Houses, as required by the Constitution, and the general course of proceeding, and the declaration of the result.

Second. Provisions for the disposition of questions arising in respect of States from which only one set of certificates has been received; that each thouse shall consider the question and shall only decide against a vote by concurrent affirmative action.

Third, Provisions for so called double returns from a State Abstract.

Third. Provisions for so-called double returns from a State; that such conflicting returns and papers shall be submitted to the consideration of a commission, composed of equal numbers of members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives and of the Supreme Court of the United States; that this commission shall be organized and sworn and have power to consider and decide, according to the Constitution and law, what is the constitutional vote of the State in question; and that such decision shall govern the disposition of the subject, unless both Houses shall determine otherwise.

Fourth. It is provided that the act shall not affect either way the question of the right of resort to the judicial courts of the United States by the persons concerned as claimants to the offices in question.

The bill provides that-

All the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of each State shall be opened, in the alphabetical order of the States, as provided in section 1 of this act; and when there shall be more than one such certificate or paper, as the certificates and papers from such States shall so be opened, (excepting duplicates of the same return,) they shall be read by the tellers, and thereupon the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decidewhether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, asshall, by the Constitution and nove existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration; which decision shall be made in writing, stating briefly the ground thereof, and signed by the members of said commission agreeing therein; whereupon the two Houses shall again meet, and such decision shall be read and entered in the Journal of each House, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of said commission agr

Whatever may be the effect of this bill if it can become a law, it Whatever may be the effect of this bill if it can become a law, it must be apparent to all that the purpose at least of some of those who favor it is, if possible, to reject electoral votes cast in proper form by electors having the lawful evidence of authority, and transmitted to the President of the Senate in the mode and with all the forms required by the Constitution and laws. I do not believe the bill can properly be so construed. Its language will justify no such construction. Congress could not give to the commission a power to hear evidence which could not be heard without the bill; because the Constitution determines the evidence on which the count of electoral votes shall be made.

CANNOT GO BEHIND THE RETURNS.

CANNOT GO BEHIND THE RETURNS.

I propose to state, as briefly as I can, some of the reasons why electoral votes having the legal evidence of validity cannot be rejected in the count required by the Constitution.

First of all, it would be a gross and palpable violation of the Constitution; this is manifest from its language. In examining this subject we must bear in mind that voters in the States do not vote directly for President or Vice-President. The voters in the States did, as the Constitution and laws authorized, vote for electors of President and Vice-President on the 7th of November. The officers in the States, charged by State law with the duty of ascertaining and declaring the charged by State law with the duty of ascertaining and declaring the result of that vote, performed their duty, and declared certain persons duly appointed electors by such votes. On the 6th day of December, the day fixed by law, the electors holding the legal credentials of office voted for candidates for President and Vice-President and transoffice voted for candidates for President and Vice-President and transmitted their votes in due form as the Constitution requires to the President of the Senate. These votes are yet to be counted and the result declared. The Constitution makes no provision as to counting the votes cast by voters in November. On this subject it gives no power. In declaring what votes shall be counted, it by necessary implication excludes all power to count any other votes or look into any other election. Provision is made by act of Congress and by the Constitution as to counting the votes cast by the electors for President and Vice-President, but not for a recount of the normary vote. By and Vice-President, but not for a recount of the popular vote. By the act of Congress of March 1, 1792, it is made the duty of the two Houses of Congress to assemble together on the 14th of February, and the Constitution declares as to the electoral votes that—

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of the terresentatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

Here is the clause of the Constitution which imposes the duty of Here is the clause of the Constitution which imposes the duty of counting, defines what shall be counted, and makes a refusal a violation of the Constitution. There is a duty to count, not a power to reject. But what shall be counted? Clearly and beyond all doubt every vote which comes with the lawful evidence of authenticity. This is the plain declaration and purpose of the Constitution. The language is explicit and unmistakable: "The votes shall then be counted." Here is a duty which cannot be omitted or left unperformed. There is no discretion.

Here is a power to count the votes which come with the legal evidence of validity. But there is no authority beyond this. The Constitution might have declared that the President of the Senate, or either House of Congress, or both together, might, before counting the elect-oral votes, ascertain by evidence whether the State officers decided correctly in declaring the result of the vote for electors. But it has given no such power.

It might have declared that when the President of the Senate had opened the votes of electors, some tribunal might, before counting, inquire and decide "whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such

But it has given no such power. It is not pretended such power is given in express terms; certainly none can be taken by inference. The inference is against it. The power which is given is to count votes regular in form. This is coupled with a duty to do so. This is the whole of the power. It necessarily excludes all other evidence or inquiry.

of the power. It necessarily excludes all other evidence or inquiry. The maxim may well apply, expressio unius, exclusio alterius. Words which give and at the same time limit a power are not to be so construed as to enlarge it beyond the limitation.

If a power could be inferred to go back of the elector's certificate of appointment it might defeat the duty to count so imperatively enjoined by the Constitution. There can be no inferred or incidental power which can be employed to defeat the duty enjoined.

The Constitution does not in express and precise terms say who shall count the votes, but it does make absolutely imperative and certain two things: first, that the President of the Senate, and no other authority, shall open the votes in the presence of the Senate and House, and, second, that the votes shall then be counted. No law requires any disclosure of what the votes are, and this is not necessarily and cannot be officially known until the votes are opened by the President of the be officially known until the votes are opened by the President of the

No provision is made for taking evidence as to the votes. The Constitution does not contemplate any evidence or inquiry in this count which can go beyond the votes and the lawful evidence which

The count cannot be made elsewhere than in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives or upon other evidence.

It is incredible that the Constitution could intend that evidence may be taken as to electoral votes before they can be seen and before it can be known what they are. No provision is made for the surrender of the votes to any authority for this or any purpose beyond the count as they are. The two Houses have no custody or offiyond the count as they are. The two Houses have no custody or official knowledge of them in advance of the count, and so it would scarcely be possible to take evidence to affect the count.

When the votes are opened by the President of the Senate, the Constitution says they shall then be counted. This looks to no delay, no inquiry by any court or commission in advance of the count. The act of Congress of 1792 only requires Congress to be in session for a single day to witness the opening of the votes. Laws may be passed "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" this single duty of counting the proper votes by the authority which counts, and on the sole record evidence required by the Constitution.

But where is the authority which converts the Houses of Congress, or authorizes Congress now to convert them, into a great canvassing board, with the duplicate power to count the electoral votes and hear evidence and revise the canvass in the States for electors? Surely if evidence and revise the canvass in the States for electors? it had been intended to give these great powers, some words appropriate for the purpose would have been used. The Constitution requires the electoral votes to be opened by the President of the Senate "in the presence of the Senate and House." It does not require them to be counted by or even in the presence of the Senate and

On these passive words, "in the presence," and on these alone, rests the whole claim for the powers of Congress. They are not words which give any power to do any act. They do require a condition of absolute passivity.

We have heard of the doctrine of a "strict construction" of the Constitution. In the name of that doctrine nearly every great infraction of the Constitution in our history has occurred, culminating in rebellion.

And now very many of those who profess to be "strict constructionists," and the defenders of "State rights" have discovered these immense powers in the passive words "in the presence of."

A more latitudinarian, forced, and extravagant construction of the Constitution never was suggested, and if it can now prevail it will be impossible to set bounds to the powers which Congress shall exercise hereafter. cise hereafter.

The Constitution gives to the President of the Senate the exclusive power to "open all the certificates." He is made the judge of what are certificates. These alone he is required to open. (Martin vs. Mott, 12 Wheaton, 31.) When the Constitution gave him this high power it is fair to infer that he is authorized to count the votes which he is authorized to determine are duly certified.

The same result is reached by considering other provisions of the Constitution. These provide that:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States.

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Here is an express delegation of power to each branch of Congress to go behind the certificate of election furnished by State officers and to go behind the certificate of election furnished by State officers and to ascertain by proof who have in fact received a majority of lawful votes. This is a power which might well have been left to inference as one arising by general parliamentary law. But the framers of the Constitution in this, as in all other grants of power, were precise in the terms employed, and carefully avoided, as far as possible, all grounds for the exercise of powers inferred. This care is further shown by the tenth amendment, which declares that—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

It is impossible to believe that the Constitution intended simply by inference to give to Congress the transcendent power to "be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of "presidential electors" when it permits no such inferential power as to members of Congress. The provisions of the Constitution as to Senators and Representatives are similar to those as to electors; yet we are asked to hold that the framers of the Constitution in one case believed an express grant of power necessary to enable the Houses of Congress to judge of the elections, returns, and qualification of members, and in the other case that such power could be exercised as incidental or by inference. This would destroy the symmetry of the Constitution and require commentators to write across its face —nil fuit unquam Sic impar sibi.

The very structure of our Government shows that there is no power in the count of electoral votes required by the Constitution to go behind the duly-certified returns.

It is a Government of delegated powers. The powers of Congress are specific, enumerated, and limited. But a power to take evidence and go behind the returns is not one of them. The powers delegated to officers under the Constitution are specific and defined. But the President of the Senate is not, by virtue of any clause of the Constitution, or by any usage, empowered to take evidence, and so cannot go behind the returns.

The power to hear evidence and reject votes is judicial. This is conceded by every authority on the subject. It is the power exercised on quo warranto, and by courts clothed with the authority of hearing and deciding contested elections.

By the Constitution all indicial power is rested in the courts.

and deciding contested elections.

By the Constitution all judicial power is vested in the courts, except as each House is by express provision clothed with judicial power to "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members."

The power to count electoral votes in the first instance required by the Constitution is ministerial and executive in character. (McCrary's Law of Elections, section 81; State vs. Steers, 44 Mo., 223.)

Until the ministerial duty is performed and its result declared by the election of a President, no judicial question can properly arise affecting the title to the office, and then, if at all, only in the proper courts, duly authorized. The bill now pending in relation to counting the votes proposes to create a commission to hear evidence and return its findings of fact and conclusions to the two Houses of Congress. These are to be laid before the two Houses as evidence. On these it is proposed that the two Houses shall act judicially. It is an gress. These are to be laid before the two Houses as evidence. On these it is proposed that the two Houses shall act judicially. It is an attempt to require the performance of judicial duties by Congress as much so as though the two Houses were acting on a quo warranto or in the trial of a contested election.

Another provision of the Constitution requires some notice. It declares that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct," the electors of President and Vice-President. The appointment of electors is by this clause intrusted exclusively to the States. It is a duty which cannot be defeated by any other authority. The mode of canvassing the votes of citizens cast for appointing electors is left to be determined by the States. The powers of the State canvassers are determined by State laws. In some States, as Louisiana, the State canvassers have, by express statute, quasi-judicial power, and may on proof exclude from the canvass the statement of votes from any poll where "riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election." (Senate Executive Document No. 2, second session, Fortyfourth Congress, page 161.)

ences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election." (Senate Executive Document No. 2, second session, Forty-fourth Congress, page 161.)

In the States generally the canvassers can exercise only ministerial power—the duty of aggregating and delaring the result as it appears on the face of the returns before them, with the incidental power of deciding what are returns. (McCrary's Law of Elections, section 82.) But each State has the undoubted right and power to decide by its laws what its condition may require as to the powers of canvassing officers. Neither Congress nor any officer can call in question this power or refuse to give it effect, without an encroachment on State rights. Whatever power may be exercised by courts, neither House of Congress nor both together, nor any officer of Congress or other authority, for any purpose of counting the electoral vote, is, or can be, authorized by any law to dispute the fairness or legality of the canvass or the evidence of the result which shall be furnished in pursuance of law. If this could be done, then each State would not, as the Constitution declares it shall, appoint its electors "in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct." The appointment would in such case be in fact and in effect by the officer or body assuming to "go behind the certificate of any officers of the State."

The framers of the Constitution did not intend that any such power should be exercised. Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, in the Senate, on the 23d of January, 1800, is reported to have said:

He remembered very well that in the Federal convention great care was used to manner the election of the President of the United States independently of Convention for the lection of the President of the United States independently of Convention for the lection of the President of the United States independently of Convention for the lection of the President of the United States independently of Convention for the lection of the President of the United States

He remembered very well that in the Federal convention great care was used to provide for the election of the President of the United States independently of Congress. To take the business as far as possible out of their hands, the votes are to be given by electors appointed for that express purpose, the electors are to be appointed by each State, and the whole direction as to the manner of their appointment is given to the State Legislatures. Nothing was more clear to him than that Congress had no right to medide with it at all. As the whole was intrusted to the State Legislatures, they must make provision for all questions arising on the occasion.—House Miscellaneous Document No. 13, Forty-fourth Congress, second session, page 16.

The framers of the Constitution were fully aware of what De Tocqueville calls "the tendency which legislative assemblies have to get possession of the government," and they guarded against such encroachments with studied care. My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] has shown that one-seventh part of all of their deliberations were devoted to this object. I will not go into the history which he has so voted to this object. I will not go into the history which he has so fully and ably presented in his masterly speech, one of the grandest efforts of this age. The men who made the Constitution did not intend to make the two Houses of Congress a great returning and canvassing board to revise the returns from the States. This is perfectly certain, from a history in part preceding and in part contemporaneous with the early history of our Constitution.

I will cite a memorable authority from the State of New York, one of the earliest authorities in our history, and it is valuable because it grew up in our early history. On the 20th of April, 1777, New York adopted her first constitution. By that constitution it was provided—

That the supreme executive power and authority of this State shall be vested in a governor; and that steadily once in every three years, and as often as the seat of government shall become vacant, a wise and discreet freeholder of this State shall be by ballot elected governor, by the freeholders of this State, qualified as before described to elect senators; which elections shall be always held at the times and places of choosing representatives in assembly for each respective county; and that the person who hath the greatest number of votes within the said State shall be the governor thereof.

The constitution did not provide a mode of canvassing the votes for governor.

On the 13th of February, 1787, the Legislature of that State passed an act for regulating elections. By the eleventh section of that act it was provided-

It was provided—

That a joint committee shall be appointed yearly and every year, to canvass and estimate the votes for governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators, or such of them as are then to be chosen; which committee shall consist of twelve members, that is to say, six to be appointed by the senate out of their body, and six to be appointed by the assembly out of their body; and such committee shall be annually appointed by resolutions of each body, respectively, and shall meet at the office of the sceretary of this State, on the last Tuesday of May; at which meeting the said joint committee, or a major part of them, or the survivors of them, or the major part of such survivors, shall, on the said day, and on so many days next succeeding thereto as shall be necessary for the purpose, proceed to open the said boxes, one after the other, and the inclosures therein contained, respectively, and canvass and estimate the votes therein contained.

Well, sir, in April, 1792, an election for governor took place in New York. The candidates were Governor Clinton and Chief-Justice Jay. The former was re-elected.

By the then existing laws of New York, which I have read, ballots that were taken in the several counties were, immediately after the election, transmitted to the office of the secretary of state and there kept till the second Tuesday in May, when the board of canvassers were to convene and canvass them.

The board of canvassers was a joint committee of eleven appointed by the senate and house of assembly of New York from themselves, and its duty was to canyass the votes cast for governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators, and to announce the result. The board of canvassers consisted of David Gelston, Thomas Tillotson, Daniel Graham, Melancton Smith, David McCarty, P. V. Courtlandt, Jonathan N. Havens, Samuel Jones, Isaac Roosevelt, Leonard Gansevoort, and Joshua Sands.

The joint committee threw out and destroyed the votes of Clinton, Otsego, and Tioga Counties, thereby electing Clinton governor.

The subject was fully discussed by many prominent men of both parties, among them Rufus King, Stephen Lush, Cornelius Bogart, Aaron Burr, Pierpont Edwards, John Lawrence, Jonathan D. Sergeant, Robert Troup, Edmund Randolph, Asher Miller, and Dudley Baldwin. The greatest interest was felt in the result throughout the United States, and an attempt was made to bring the matter before the New York house of assembly.

The greatest interest was felt in this matter, as I have said, and that body adopted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas by the eleventh section of the act for regulating elections it is enacted

Whereas by the eleventh section of the act for regulating elections it is enacted that all questions which shall arise upon any carvass and estimate, or upon any of the proceedings therein, shall be determined according to the opinion of the major part of the said canvassing committee, and that their judgment and determination shall in all cases be binding and conclusive: Therefore, *Resolved*, As the sense of this house, that the Legislature cannot annul or make void any of the determinations of the said committee.

Whether this committee acted in accordance with law I do not undertake to say; but the principle announced in this preamble and resolution has been followed in all the States and by all the courts.

It was affirmed by Alexander Hamilton, the greatest intellect of our early history, that the result as announced by the canvassers was absolutely conclusive, and that no power existed to go behind it. In his letter to Rufus King, of July 25, 1792, he said:

In his fetter to Kullis King, of July 25, 1132, he said:

To rejudge the decision of the canvassers by a convention has to me too much the appearance of reversing the sentence of a court by a legislative decree. The canvassers had a final authority in all the forms of the constitution and laws. A question arose in the execution of their office not absolutely free from difficulty, which they have decided, I am persuaded, wrongly, but within the power vested in them. I do not feel it right or expedient to attempt to reverse the decision by any means not known to the constitution or laws. The precedent may suit us to-day, but to-morrow we may rue its abuse.—Hamilton's History of the Republic, volume 5 nagra 29.

This is the opinion of the great statesman as it is found recorded by one who inherited his illustrious name and talents and who has given to the world the most elaborate, learned, accurate, and valuable political history of the Republic ever produced.

It was Hamilton who, on the committee of revision in the convention which gave us the Constitution, put in final shape the clause which gives the power to count the electoral votes. He has given us the law as to the conclusive effect of the decision of State canvassers.

When, therefore, the Constitution gives authority to count the electoral votes, it treats them as final and there is no power to go behind them.

On this subject I commend to the able gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Tucker,] who has discussed this subject with so much ability, the words of John Randolph, of Roanoake.

On the 14th of February, 1821, in this House, he indignantly denied that there was any power to call in question the electoral vote of a State, and he declared it an invasion of its rights and its sovereignty in giving its vote. He said:

He could not recognize in this House or the other House, singly or conjointly, the power to decide on the votes of any State. He maintained that the electoral college was as independent of Congress as Congress of them, and we have no right to judge of their proceedings. He would rather see an interregnum, or see no votes counted at all, than to see a principle adopted which went to the very foundation on which the presidential office rested. Suppose a case in which some gentleman of one House or the other should choose to turn up his nose at the vote of some State, and say that if it be so and so such a person is elected; and if so and so what-you-call-'im is elected, did not everybody see the absurdity of such a proposition?

Yet Randolph's own Virginia is here to-day with her nose turned up at the vote of a State! Let Virginia now turn down her nose, or let her sacred soil give up the remains of her great statesman now sleeping

I commend to gentlemen from Virginia the opinion of their own great Madison. In his letter of March 15, 1800, to Jefferson, he denounced a bill which like that now before us sought to give to Congress control over the count of the electoral votes and he said:

Should the spirit of the bill be followed up it is impossible to say how far the choice of the Executive may be drawn out of the constitutional hands and subjected to the management of the Legislature.—Writings, volume 2, page 157.

EIGHT REASONS.

And now let us see some of the difficulties in the way of making inquiry back of the electoral votes lawful in form with a view to reject them in the count required by the Constitution.

I deny that there is any such authority, because:

1. The Constitution gives no express or substantive power to make any provides no means of doing so. Yet we are asked such inquiry and provides no means of doing so.

to make it without any such power.

2. The power is not incidental to the authority to count, because the Constitution and laws define specifically what shall be counted, without addition or subtraction. Yet we are asked, without authority, to add to and subtract from the electoral votes which the Constitution requires to be counted and which come with the constitutional syndence of entheoryticity.

evidence of authenticity.

3. The Constitution says the votes sent from the States with the lawful evidence of validity "shall be counted."

We are asked to say they or some of them shall not.

4. The Constitution says each State shall appoint electors in such manner as the Legislature may direct, who shall vote for President. This necessarily carries with it the power to furnish conclusive evidence of the appointment and the right of the State to have the evidence received and the votes counted. Yet we are asked to say that the appointment of electors by the States and by them duly certified shall be disregarded.

5. The Constitution forbids the exercise of powers not delegated.

5. The Constitution forbids the exercise of powers not delegated. Yet we are asked to exercise a power not delegated, but absolutely denied to Congress; denied by necessary inference and denied because vested in the President of the Senate.

cause vested in the President of the Senate.

6. The Constitution limits the power of counting electoral votes to the performance of a ministerial duty executive in its character. We are asked to disregard this, and require Congress, clothed only with legislative power, to perform executive duties.

7. The Constitution gives judicial power only to courts. We are asked to demand its exercise by Congress.

8. The settled doctrine of every court in the land is that the official acts of officers holding the proper certificate of election are valid, and cannot be called in question, as I will hereafter show. Yet we are asked to disregard and overturn all rules of law on this subject and disregard the official acts of elections holding the proper certificates of election. A more flagrant, palpable, monstrous, and dangerous of election. A more flagrant, palpable, monstrous, and dangerous disregard of the Constitution never was and never can be suggested, invented, or conceived than this of attempting, upon any pretext whatever, in the count required by the Constitution, to reject electoral votes which bear on their face the proper evidence of legal validity.

THE AUTHORITY OF THE COURTS ON THE QUESTION.

It would reverse the practice and authority of every court of this country from the landing at Plymouth Rock to this hour. The whole law upon this subject and the authorities which support it are stated in lucid terms in the able work on The American Law of Elections, by my learned friend, the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Mc-CRARY.] He says:

It is well settled that the duties of canvassing officers are purely ministerial, and extend only to the casting up of the votes and awarding the certificate to the person having the highest number; they have no judicial power. * * It does not follow from this doctrine that canvassing and return judges must receive and count whatever purports to be a return, whether it bears upon its face sufficient proof that it is such or not. The true rule is this: they must receive and count the votes as shown by the returns, and they cannot go behind the returns for any purpose. (Section 81, 82.)

This is the rule, founded on statutes which give power to canvass or count votes and certify results. The power given by the Constitution is not so broad as the statutes generally. It gives a power to count only, the narrowest possible power. In four of our States—Texas, Alabama, Louisiana, and Florida—there are statutes which go beyond this and in express terms give authority to revise returns and reject votes. (McCrary, section 86; Senate Ex. Doc., No. 2, second session Forty-fourth Congress, page 160.) In Morgan vs. Quackenbush, 22 Barbour, 77, it is said of election canvassers, under a statute in the general form, that general form, that-

They are not at liberty to receive evidence of anything outside of the returns temselves; their duty consists in a simple matter of arithmetic.

The Supreme Court of the United States has said, in Martin vs. Mott, (12 Wheaton, 29-31,) that—Whenever a statute gives a discretionary power to any person, to be exercised by him upon his own opinion of certain facts, it is a sound rule of construction that the statute constitutes him the sole and exclusive judge of the existence of these facts.

These rules of law govern the canvass by State boards in determining the choice of electors and the count of votes of electors transmitted to the President of the Senate. They are absolutely conclusive, for, whether the electoral votes are to be counted by the President of the Senate or the two Houses of Congress, for this purpose they are merely canvassing officers under the single power to count. Upon these authorities then, when the Constitution says-those who count "are not at liberty to receive evidence outside of the returns themselves; their duty consists in a simple matter of arithmetic."

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted—

This is rendered still more certain by what the Constitution further says:

The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed.

The only duty in counting the electoral vote "consists in a simple matter of arithmetic"—in computing numbers. If the power to count carries with it the authority to "go back of the returns," then in every State of the Union, every State and local board of canvassers may, in their own discretion and on such evidence as they deem proper, under a similar power, set aside the will of the people and dictate the officers of their choice.

But this is not all. The courts have met directly the question whether the acts of officers can be declared invalid because not duly elected, and it is now undisputed law that if a person comes into office by color of legal appointment or election, he is an officer de facto, his acts in that capacity are valid and effectual when they concern the public and third persons, although it may appear he has no legal or constitutional right to the office. His official acts are as valid as or constitutional right to the office. His official acts are as valid as those of an officer de jure, and they cannot be invalidated by any inquiry or evidence back of his certificate of election.

Public interests imperatively require this rule, and it has been adopted as undisputed law by this House. (Barnes vs. Adams, 2 Bartlett, 760; McCrary, section 79.)

This doctrine has been deemed so essential to the public interest, that persons declared ineligible by law have nevertheless been regarded as officers de facto and their official acts valid when done under color of legal appointment. (McGregor vs. Balch, 14 Vermont, 428.)

Many laws have been passed in Congress by the casting votes of members who were subsequently declared not legally elected. But the laws they made by their votes have always been held valid.

The same may be said of the laws in almost every State of the Union. Judgments have been rendered in the courts by judges who were subsequently ousted from office on quo warranto as not legally elected, but their judgments still stood as valid and unquestioned.

A large part of the land titles in many of the States depends on official acts of persons ousted from office as not legally elected, but official acts of persons ousted from office as not legally elected, but the titles are not thereby disturbed. To overturn all this law is to destroy the foundations of society, the title to property, the obligations of the domestic relations, and convert the land into a pande-

Mand now to apply these principles.

The electors of President and Vice-President duly certified as appointed in Louisiana and other States performed the official act of casting their votes, and these have been duly certified to the President of the Senate. They are acts which affect the public. For all purposes of the count required by the Constitution, the authority and votes of these electors cannot be called in question.

This is the law as it is settled in this House and by all the courts.

To contravert it now is to disregard all law all authority all presidents.

To controvert it now is to disregard all law, all authority, all precedent resting on reason and principle.

This is only an application of the principle well understood as to members in both branches of Congress.

When a Representative comes to this House with the proper cer-When a Representative comes to this House with the proper certificate of election from his State, it is by universal usage, as we all know, conclusive of his right to act as such until otherwise determined, under the express power to "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of members." The same principle applies in the Senate and in the legislative bodies in every State.

But as no such express power is given to judge as to electors, their votes in due form and having the legal evidence of authority must be counted. And if the power existed it could not invalidate acts done or electoral votes already given.

But it is said that State canvassers may by mistake or fraud declare electors duly appointed when the honest votes of the people are the other way, and that this would be a grievous wrong to the people. In answer to this, I say the result of an election must be decided by some authority. If Congress may re-examine returns, the same or worse errors may occur and the same or worse and more grievous wrongs re-esult. The Constitution has given to the States the power to select canvassing officers, but it has not made Congress a State canvassing

But is there no remedy if State canvassers err? It may be said there should be a remedy. I might ask with equal propriety, is there any remedy if Congress should err in attempting to revise the decision of State canvassers? The record of contested elections in Congress does not attest the infallibility of congressional decisions. It is not to be assumed that State canvassers will be less honest or capable than the Houses of Congress. If there be any power to revise the results of the electoral votes, it is purely judicial. It may be that Congress may have power to create a dignified, impartial, able court to hear and decide a contested presidential election in which the candihear and decide a contested presidential election in which the candidates and the people can be judicially heard. (House Rep., No. 31, 3

Such a contest involves judicial power. The Constitution authorizes Congress to create courts for the exercise of all judicial power involving every question and every right that can arise under the Constitution. The right to the presidential office arises under the Constitution, and therefore may be made the subject of judicial incommunication and the constitution are constitution. quiry unless the Constitution has made the count required by it as final. (Ex parte H. E. Hayne, in House Mis. Doc. No. 31, 2 sess. 44 Congress, per Bond, judge.)

But the trial of such a contested election cannot precede the inauguration of the President. (Attorney-General, &c., rs. Barstow, 4 Wisconsin, 567.

The certificate of election to a candidate for Congress gives a right to a seat on this floor, and in all legislative bodies the contest comes afterward. And so it may be as to the office of President.

The Constitution is so made that there may be a remedy adequate for every wrong. And because this is so there never can be any exfor every wrong. And because this is so there never can be any excuse for resisting its commands. Any threat to disturb the public peace and to secure by violence what the Constitution does not authorize is premeditated treason. To yield to this is to invite its repetition and surrender the government of law to the anarchy of

The proposition to "go behind the returns" in making the count of electoral votes given at the proper time and in the mode and having the authority of the evidence required by the Constitution is the most corrupting in its tendency, dangerous in its character, and revolutionary in its effect of any ever broached before the American people. It is revolution without disguise, and with its success "the Government of the people, by the people, and for the people" will be endangered through all time. The electors chosen by the States will no longer elect a President, but Congress will or may "go back of the returns" and reject such electors as may be necessary to keep or place in power a partisan choice. The President will or may be indefinitely made by Congress and not by the real electors of the States.

Give to Congress this power and it will become a central despotism

A President ambitious of a re-election will find excuses for bargain and intrigue to perpetuate his power. A partisan Congress may lend a willing ear to these, and, in the general and reckless scramble to perpetuate power, the rights of the States will be trampled in the dust, the will of the people be ignored, and the Republic of our fathers will perish forever.

Will I be told all this is necessary to preserve the public peace and compromise existing difficulties? This is a proposition to unsettle the foundations of the Government as laid by our fathers. It is a proposition to reject the safeguards they gave us against controversy.

proposition to reject the safeguards they gave us against controversy. It is a surrender to clamor which will invite still other and greater alarms and demands for concessions in the future. It is a surrender alarms and demands for concessions in the litture. It is a surface of principle and law to the uncertain and unsatisfactory results of revolutionary nurnoses and unconstitutional schemes. To yield to revolutionary purposes and unconstitutional schemes. To yield to these is but to invite new and intensified revolutions in the future.

Far better is it to stand by the landmarks of the Constitution and courageously meet, in every form which emergencies may require, all who are its enemies.

COMPROMISE.

"Compromise," did I hear? We tried the Missouri compromise of 1820. The surrender then made encouraged in due time a fresh demand for compromise. This was to surrender the compromise itself, and it fell before the Kansas-Nebraska act of 1854. A surrender of a part led to a surrender of all.

part led to a surrender of all.

We tried the compromise of 1832 to appease the threat of South Carolina nullification. We were repaid by South Carolina secession in December, 1860. We tried the compromise measures of 1850. The surrender then made only encouraged the new demands for concession which followed. Those who were demanding compromises and concessions at last were encouraged to believe that the right of the people to elect a President of their choice in 1860 would be surrendered. In this they failed. It was compromise that led to Sumter. We were saved from this by Grant and Appomattox.

A new compromise now may at some time in the future lead to another Sumter and this may fail to find another Grant and another Appomattox.

I am for the Constitution; this cannot be compromised in its commands or the duties it enjoins without danger to the Republic. It was the compromise of 1821 in relation to the electoral vote of that State which brings the demand for compromise now. Compromise has

If we must call in the aid of chosen members of the Supreme Court, is it not better to demand the judgment of the entire court on every controverted question on this subject and abide by its impartial determination?

Let us stand by the Constitution as it is, accept the results which come in the forms of law and from those who execute its provisions, neither offer or threaten resistance, bury out of sight forever the memory of all past differences, and remember only that we are citizens of a common Republic, and resolve that henceforth we shall have neither crimination nor recrimination, and that we will learn war no more

With all this evidence before us of what the Constitution is and the danger of departing from its letter and spirit and purpose, I regard it as absolutely certain that, in the count of the electoral votes required by the Constitution, those votes which come with the usual and legal evidence of validity shall be counted, if the Constitution is to be obeyed.

OBJECTIONS TO THE ELECTORAL BILL.

I object, then, to the bill to regulate the counting of electoral votes,

1. In requiring evidence to be considered in the count, which goes back of the returns required by the Constitution and which may controvert the authority of electors who have the constitutional evidence of a right to act as such, it is unconstitutional and void.

2. It proposes to take from the President of the Senate the power vested in him by the Constitution to count the electoral votes.

3. It subjects the executive authority to the control of the legislalative power, in violation of the purpose of the Constitution to preserve independent co-ordinate departments and to give to the States the control of the presidential election.

4. It establishes a dangerous precedent, which may be destructive of the rights of the States to appoint electors "in such manner as the Legislatures thereof may direct," and fatal to the existence of the Republic. It will invite other Oregons, other double votes, other Louisiana investigations.

5. It is impossible that the commission provided by this bill can reach a result which will command the confidence of the people. It cannot employ the time or the agencies requisite for the purpose

I pass by the question whether it creates officers appointed by Congress, ignoring the power of the President to appoint officers, and the other question whether a member of Congress can fill an office created during his term.

Neither the time nor the circumstances under which this bill comes to us nor the manner in which the proposed commission can exercise its powers can commend it to our favor. It is a contrivance, a veritable wooden horse, which in the guise of peace offers overtures in the name of friendship which may destroy the Republic that has withstood the assaults of all other enemies.

Timeo Danaos, et dona ferentes. OBEDIENCE TO THE DECISION.

If the bill shall pass and become a law we must all bow to its authority, and it must be carried out in good faith, in a spirit of candor, of fairness, and justice. The results which follow from it must be accepted in the interest of peace, of order, and of law.

HOW ABOUT OREGON?

Some days ago I was asked in this House if I would apply the principles for which I have contended to the electoral vote of Oregon. I answer emphatically I would. My ideas of law are not made for an emergency. They are such as I believe will "stand the test of human scrutiny, of talents, and of time."

Fortunately for the cause of truth, justice, and popular government, the stupendous fraud attempted in Oregon, like a vaulting whiting heavendoened itself and foiled of its purposes.

ambition, has overleaped itself and failed of its purpose.

There's a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them as we may.

No difficulty can arise in counting the electoral vote of Oregon.

Let us see the facts as they are:

At the presidential election in November the republican candidates for electors were J. C. Cartwright, J. H. Odell, and J. W. Watts. They received a majority of all the votes, and their election was duly certified by the secretary of state of Oregon, under the great seal of

The democratic candidates for electors were Henry Klipper, W. B. Caswell, and E. A. Cronin, who received a minority of the popular

The governor of Oregon assumed to decide that J. W. Watts, one The governor of Oregon assumed to decide that J. W. Watts, one of the republican electors, was ineligible upon the ground that he was a postmaster on the day of the election. He accordingly issued a certificate of election to Cartright, Odell, and Cronin, two republicans having a majority of the popular vote and one democrat, who, as against Watts, had a minority vote. This commission, or certificate of election, was delivered in triplicate to Cronin, the democrat.

The Constitution of Oregon expressly provides that—in all elections held by the people under this Constitution the person or persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be duly declared elected.

The Oregon statute is to the same effect. It is well-settled law that Cronin was not lawfully elected by reason of any ineligibility of Watts. (McCrary, chapter 5, section 231, &c.; Morton in Senate, December 7.) The Oregon statute (Laws of 1864, section 6) declares it to be the duty of the secretary of state "to make lists of the elect-ore elected" and affix the State scale to them and they are to be size. ors elected" and affix the State seal to them, and they are to be signed by the governor, and the secretary is required to deliver the certified lists "to the college of electors at the meeting" on the first Wednesday in November.

And if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed by viva voce and by plurality of votes to fill such vacancy in the electoral college.

The electors met at the proper time and place, Cronin holding the triplicate certificates of election. If he had acted with the two republican electors and if the college thus organized had cast two votes for Hayes and one for Tilden, and if all had been returned to the President of the Senate in due form, then, although covered all over with fraud and infamy, so far as the governor and Cronin and the Tilden vote is concerned, yet they would come, possibly with a force it might be difficult to dispute. But no such votes were cast or transmitted to the President of the Senate. On the contrary, Cronin declared there were two vacancies in the college of electors, and he proceeded to fill one by appointing J. N. L. Miller, and these two appointed John Parker. Assuming that this was a lawful college they gave two votes to Hayes and Wheeler and one to Tilden and Hendricks, and forwarded these, with the commission issued by the governor, to the President of the Senate. It will be seen from this that the President of the Senate is in possession of the governor's certificate or commission, showing that Cartwright and Odell, two republicans electors, with Cronin as a third, were duly appointed and commissioned. Here we have the proper evidence of the authority of two republican electors. It is therefore unnecessary to inquire if it is the duty of the President of the Senate to take judicial notice of the existence of these public officers. The courts take judicial notice of public officers without While Cronin was going through his sham performances the two republican electors received the resignation of Watts, declared the existence of a vacancy, then gave him an appointment in due form, and the three cast their votes for Hayes and Wheeler and transmitand the three cast their votes for Hayes and Wheeler and transmitted them to the President of the Senate. The two republican electors had the authority to act. They were, as the Oregon statute says and on common-law principles, the majority of electors entitled to decide all questions proper for their decision. They did ascertain and declare a vacancy. Cronin neglected to act with the majority of electors and thereby created a vacancy if it did not otherwise exist. The President of the Senate must believe, must take the decision of the majority of electors on this subject. Here then, on all the papers transmitted to the President of the Senate, the three republican votes from Oregon come with all the sanctions required by law.

from Oregon come with all the sanctions required by law.

It is well settled in all the books that where duties are intrusted to a board of officers and the time of their meeting is fixed a majority may proceed with the business of the board, in the absence or failure may proceed with the business of the board, in the absence or failure of the minority to act with them.

It is equally well settled that one member of such board acting alone and not in conjunction with the majority can do no official act. (1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, section 220, 221.)

And now, having presented my views as to the character of the electoral votes which the Constitution requires to be counted, those which on their face or on the whole record presented carry the legal evidence of authenticity, I proceed to state some reasons why in my judgment the power to count is vested by the Constitution in the President of the Senate.

REASONS IN FAVOR OF A COUNT BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

If the Constitution had merely declared that a President should be elected by electors appointed in each State "in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct," and had stopped there, Congress undoubtedly could create a board of canvassers to count the votes and declare the result. This would be legislation "necessary and and declare the result. This would be legislation "necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the" President as an officer under the Constitution.

But if the Constitution has vested the power to count the votes in the President of the Senate, or in the Houses of Congress either acting separately or in convention, this power so vested cannot be taken away or delegated to any other officer, board, or tribunal. (Ex parte Garland, 4 Wallace, 380; Prigg vs. Pa., 16 Peters, 667.)

A power so vested can no more be divested or delegated than the legislative power vested in Congress. (Cooley Const. Limitations, 116; 16 Wis., 433; 4 Harr., Del., 492.)

So far as the counting of the votes of electors is concerned the Constitution is self-executing, the power is vested either in the President of the Senate or in the two Houses of Congress. It is now too late to doubt on this question.

The language of the Constitution determines this. It leaves to legislation "the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes." But in all else it is specific and self-executing. It directs the mode of voting, requires the electors to sign and certify their votes and transmit them to the President of the Senate, and then declares that he shall, in the presence of the Senate and House, "open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted."

The convention which made the Constitution, in resolving as its opinion that when the first Congress met "the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President," treated the Constitution as self-executing. (House Miscellaneous Document No. 13, second session Forty-fourth Congress, page 4.)

If the Constitution had vested the power to count in the Houses

It the Constitution had vested the power to count in the Houses the convention could have made no such resolve as this, for it would be a resolve to violate the Constitution. The convention advised the appointment of a President pro tempore because there was yet no Vice-President, and a President pro tempore was necessary to exercise the power vested by the Constitution in the President of the Senate. And it was competent for both Houses to organize even before the inauguration of the first President.

The Congress of 1799 by its act of March 1 affirmed that the Congress of 1799 by its act of March 1 affirmed that

The Congress of 1792 by its act of March 1 affirmed that the Constitution is self-executing by providing that the certificates of electors "shall be opened, the votes counted, and the persons to fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared agree-ably to the Constitution."

The original Constitution of 1787 declared that-

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of epresentatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

The first count of electoral votes was on the 6th of April, 1789, when John Langdon certified that he as President of the Senate did "open all the certificates and count all the votes." (Miscellaneous Doen-ment 13, page 8.)

Again, at the second count of electoral votes, on the 13th February, 1793, a message from the Senate informed the House—

That a President of the Senate is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes.—Miscellaneous Document 13, page 11.

Again at the third count on the 10th of February, 1797, the President of the Senate certified that he did "open all the certificates and count all the votes." (Miscellaneous Document 13, page 14.)

Again at the fourth count the Senate met the House "for the pur-Pose of being present at the opening and counting the votes."

And it was the Vice-President who "declared the result" and so of necessity decided the votes to be counted. (Miscellaneous Document necessity decided the votes to be counted. (Miscellaneous Document 13, page 30.)

The practice for many years after the ratification of the twelfth amendment conformed to this construction.

At the fifth count of the electoral vote, February 13, 1805, Thomas Jefferson was re-elected President and George Clinton elected Vice-President. Jefferson, being in Washington, was notified of his election by a committee of the two Houses; and under a resolution of the Senate a certificate was directed to be signed by the Vice-President and sent to Mr Clinton, which read:

the Senate a certificate was directed to be signed by the vice-Fresident and sent to Mr Clinton, which read:

Be it known that, the Senate and House of Representatives being convened in the city of Washington, * * * the underwritten, Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, did, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes. * * In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 14th day of Febru ary, 1805.

AARON BURR.

AARON BURR.

The sixth count occurred on the 8th of February, 1809, when James Madison was elected President and George Clinton Vice-President.

The undersigned, President of the Senate pro tempore, did in the presence, &c., open all the certificates and count all the votes, &c. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Senate to be fixed, this — day of February, 1809.

This was signed by John Milledge, of Georgia.

The seventh count, on the 10th day of February, 1813, resulted in the election of James Madison and Elbridge Gerry. And again, by direction of the Senate, "the underwritten, President of the Senate pro tempore," certified that he did "open all the certificates and count all the votes," and sent the same to Elbridge Gerry to notify him of his election.

On the eighth count, February 10, 1817, James Monroe and Daniel D. Tompkins were elected; and again the same form of certificate, reciting that the underwritten, President of the Senate pro tempore, did "open all the certificates and count all the votes," was directed to be made by a resolution of the Senate.

made by a resolution of the Senate.

On the tenth count, February 25, 1825, the election was again thrown into the House. John Quincy Adams was elected President by the House of Representatives and John C. Calhoun Vice-President by a majority of the electors. And again, by direction of the Senate, it was certified to John C. Calhoun that the President protempore of the Senate, had opened all the certificates and "counted all the votes." Signed the certificates and "counted at the votes." Signed by John Galliard, of South Carolina.

These precedents, covering nearly forty years of our history, show the construction of the Constitution by the men who made it and were familiar with its purpose. They show that those who acted as tellers in these counts were mere clerks to register the votes first counted and delivered to them for that purpose by the President of the Senate. In all these counts neither the Senate or House ever assumed any authority over the count.

With this construction of the words of the Constitution affirming

With this construction of the words of the Constitution affirming that the opening and counting were both alike the duty of the President of the Senate, Congress submitted in 1803 to the States the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, which was adopted by the States and has ever since governed the mode of electing a President.

It copies from the original Constitution the clause which declares

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

In thus re-enacting this clause the construction put upon the same clause in the original Constitution, and which gave to the President of the Senate the sole power to open and count the votes, was ingrafted on and made a part of this article.

on and made a part of this article.

It is a rule of interpretation that when a constitution or statute has received a settled construction, its re-enactment in the same words adopts that construction as a part of the re-enactment. (Sedgwick on Statutes, 626; Pennock & Sellers vs. Dialogue, 2 Peters, 1-18.)

No inference can be drawn against the right of the President of the Senate to count by reason of the proceedings in Congress in relation to the vote of Missouri in February, 1821.

And this is equally true in relation to other States or organizations claiming to be such.

claiming to be such.

In all these cases the question was whether there were States in existence—not whether Congress could pass on the vote of an acknowledged and recognized State. (Miscellaneous Document No. 13, second session Forty-fourth Congress, pages 51, 230.)

In Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard, 42, Chief-Justice Taney declared

It rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State.

Congress might well decide that question, and it would be the duty of the President of the Senate in making the count of electoral votes only to count the votes of recognized States.

THE TWENTY-SECOND JOINT RULE.

The famous twenty-second joint rule of February, 1865, adopted without sufficient consideration during the rebellion, gives no countenance to the position that the Houses are to share in the count of electoral votes. It was designed to apply to insurrectionary States excluded from the electoral college by the joint resolution of February 8, 1865. This joint rule was in effect a mere declaration that States already declared by law without lawful governments could not be restored to the full rights of States except by some concurrent action of Congress recognizing them as such. (Miscellaneous Document 13, second session Forty-fourth Congress, page 224.) This was the doctrine of the "reconstruction laws," based on the authority of Chief-Justice Taney in Luther 18. Borden. As applied to recognized States, it is clearly unconstitutional and has been so declared by its author, and is no longer in force. (Miscellaneous Document 13. by its author, and is no longer in force. (Miscellaneous Document 13, second session Forty-fourth Congress, page 274; House Report No. 100, second session Forty-fourth Congress, part 2, page 10.) But even under that rule it was left to the President of the Senate to "announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons elected."

He was in fact the judge of what the vote was.

And now it is high time we should return and adhere to the practice under the Constitution as construed by the founders of the Republic.

I cannot enter at large into the argument in support of the right and duty of the President of the Senate to open and count the votes. I will, therefore, state in brief only some of the reasons which support this conclusion.

The President of the Senate is invested with the power to count the electoral votes, because

1. It was so determined by the resolution of the convention which made the Constitution affirming the duty of the Senate to appoint a President "for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes" for the first President of the United States. The power the votes" for the first President of the United States. The power to count was not, in the opinion of the convention, vested by the Constitution in the Houses of Congress, or this resolve could not have been made.

2. The Constitution in this respect is self-executing. And having made it the duty of the President of the Senate alone to receive and open all the certificates, and having declared that the votes should "then be counted," the natural inference is that he alone should count. This is especially so since there are no words giving power to the Houses of Congress to count, and it is more reasonable to infer that this duty devolves on the President of the Senate, who is expressly charged with the custody and opening of the certificates, rather than on the two Houses, who are not given any right at any time to such custody, and who are charged with no duty in relation

3. The Congress of 1792, composed in part of the men who in convention framed the Constitution, adopted this construction by the act of March 1, in declaring that the certificates "shall be opened, the votes counted, and the persons to fill the offices of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared agreeably to the Constitution." (House Report No. 100, second session Forty-fourth Congress, (House Report No. 100, second session Forty-fourth Congress,

Here are three duties, (1) to open the certificates, (2) to count the votes, and (3) declare the result. The first duty is given in express terms to the President of the Senate, the last by undisputed and universal usage is his duty, and upon the maxim noscitur a sociis, the duty to count is his.

4. The Congress of 1803 in submitting, and the people in ratifying, the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, adopted the construction that the President of the Senate shall count the votes. He had four times over counted the votes prior to 1803, under a clause of the Constitution in the precise words re-enacted in the twelfth amendment, and this amendment was therefore intended to give him the power.

5. After the ratification of the twelfth amendment, the usage was long continued for the President of the Senate to make the count, and this is an authoritative contemporaneous construction, which should be regarded as conclusive.

6. The President of the Senate, generally the Vice-President, and not a member of Congress, but an officer for all the people, and so representing fairly all the States, by reason of this and his high official position and the weight of his character, is presumed by the Constitution to have the impartiality, honesty, and ability to discharge the duty of counting, in a pre-eminent degree, as attested by the fact that he is made the custodian of the votes. He is charged with the duty of opening and counting the votes because these are executive acts and he is an executive officer. The two Houses of Congress are, in express terms, denied all executive power. The two Houses are incapable of being converted into a returning and canvassing board, exer-

7. It is almost practically impossible for so numerous a body as the Senate and House, acting with their separate and divided jurisdiction, to make a count of the votes. If the Constitution had so designed, provision would have been made to determine disputed questions which might arise, as these: If one House decide to reject a vote and the other to receive it, is the vote to be counted or rejected? On disputed questions shall the Houses act separately or as one convention? When a vote is presented, is it to be counted unless rejected by a majority of each House, or is a majority of each required to accept it? These and other questions calculated to provoke controversy and attended with dangers may arise if the Senate and House shall count. To say that the framers of the Constitution created such perils is to disparage their sagacity. This would make the Constitution not a "supreme law," but a supreme conundrum.

It is unreasonable to give a construction which shall involve so many perils. Public policy requires a construction which will avoid them

All these difficulties are avoided by conceding to the President of the Senate the power to count.

As the Constitution requires the presence of the Senate and House at the opening of the certificates by the President of the Senate, which is conceded to be his sole act, it is reasonable to infer that the same presence, if required at all at the count, is only for the same purpose for which it is required at the opening of the certificates, to witness the count. But if such presence be required at the count, a sufficient reason therefor is found in the fact that when the President of the Senate has declared there is no choice it is expressly made the duty of the House to "choose immediately by ballot the President." Here is a sufficient reason, and the Constitution having given this, it is not to be presumed there is any other.

The Houses of Congress can exercise only such powers as are deleated. No clause of the Constitution in terms gives to the Houses any such power. A passive presence at the count of votes is all that the Constitution requires of the Houses. No power to control the count can grow out of or be ingrafted on the single word "presence." Such power is not in the remotest degree incidental to any power that The Houses, therefore, cannot participate in the count.

10. The Constitution, by specifically enumerating all the powers of Congress and omitting any power to participate in the count, has necessarily excluded the possibility of any such power in the two

11. The Constitution, in giving to each House the express power "to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," and in omitting any declarations of a power in the Houses to judge of the elections and returns of electors, has by necessary implication excluded from them all such power. There is no such power exercised under the Constitution which hangs on so slender a thread, or has so little to support it as the claim of a power in the Houses to count electoral votes

12. The Constitution has made the President of the Senate the sole custodian of the electoral votes. Having vested in him this right as custodian, with no obligation or right to surrender the votes, it is impossible that the Houses could count.

And now, Mr. Speaker, this bill may go through all the forms of legislation; and if so, I shall hope the Constitution may survive the shock, and that the calmer deliberations of the future will devise the means of rescuing our imperiled institutions from the dangers that threaten them.

Mr. PAYNE. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr.

BLACKBURN] for ten minutes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, in the few moments allowed me by the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio, for which I tender my acknowledgments, I shall have no opportunity to discuss the issues involved in this measure, but must content myself with placing upon the record a few of the reasons which influence my vote upon the passage of this bill.

I object to it, first, because there is not in my judgment a proper subject-matter here for arbitration. I object to it, secondly, because if that postulate be not true the tribunal that it is proposed to erect is extra and anti-constitutional in its structure. I deny that it is competent for Congress to delegate its great power to pass upon the validity of an electoral vote. I deny that it is proper, even if it were competent, for Congress in making such a delegation of its power competent, for Congress in making such a delegation of its power to merge two of the independent co-ordinate branches of this Government, to call in the aid of the judiciary to assist the legislative branch in the discharge of a function which by the Constitution has been imposed wholly upon the latter. The bulwarks that divide and separate co-ordinate branches of this Government this bill proposes to break down. If it is competent for you to call in the judiciary to aid the legislative branch in ascertaining this result, why is it not competent for you to ignore the judiciary and call in the other co-ordinate branch, the executive department? Why should you not make the President of the United States the umpire between the two Houses, and thus clothe him with a power to name his own successor? Houses, and thus clothe him with a power to name his own successor?

But, sir, I object to the measure upon another ground, more forcible

I object to it because if passed it robs this House of the constitutional percogative to protect a popular right. I hold that under the provisions of the Constitution (in common with a majority of the members of this House and in accordance with the expression of the Senate as illustrated in its vote upon this bill yesterday morning) the President of the Senate has no authority in the count to settle anything as regards the validity of any vote; that this power is lodged with the two Houses of Congress, and that nothing coming here as the vote of a State can be received if this House enters its protest against it. But, sir, if this bill should pass, and your joint commission should return a verdict in favor of counting the vote of Florida and Louisiana for Mr. Hayes and Mr. Wheeler, this House stands shorn of its power to object, unless the Senate shall concur in that objection. To agree to this is, in my judgment, an abandonment of the rights that the people have committed to our keeping. Not one atom of popular right in the matter of the selection of the people's rulers will I ever surrender, not one prerogative of this House that looks to the protection of that popular right will I ever consent of the members of this House and in accordance with the expression to abandon. If this matter needs to be arbitrated, we require another tribunal

But I deny that there is anything proper for such a tribunal to pass upon. The people at the polls have made an election; it becomes our duty to ascertain and promulgate the result. If in this I am in error, if no election has been had, then the Constitution unquestionably makes it the duty of this House to proceed to the election of a President. I say this with all deference to the gentlemen who with laborious effort have produced this compromise.

I say it without impugning their wisdom, their patriotism, or their purpose, but I say it and utter it as my deliberate conviction that it is but a temporary make-shift, for which the advocates themselves dare not plead as a precedent in the future; that it is but an abor-tion, born of a timidity which seeks to avoid the responsibilities of the

If this fraud is to be consummated, if the popular verdict is to be reversed, if the Constitution is to be disregarded, if the precedents and traditions of the country are to be outraged by the induction into the Presidency of a man who has been repudiated at the polls, I say let it be done by an open application of arbitrary power, let it be done by force, let it be done amid the throes of revolution, and not seek shelter under a law of questionable constitutionality.

Whatever else may be said, I do sincerely trust it can never be truthfully said of this Congress that it abandoned its prerogatives and sought to avoid responsibilities imposed by the Constitution which it has sworn to support.

I trust it may never be truthfully charged that in this crisis timidity appeared where manliness should prevail and cowardice usurped the hour in which courage should rule. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Loves 2]

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I should have been glad to have had an opportunity to express my views at large upon this most important measure. That being denied me, I accept the conressy of my friend who has just taken his seat, merely to indicate the reasons which impel me to vote against it. I do not hesitate so much upon the constitutionality as the policy of the measure and my sworn duty to accept or reject it. I am inclined to believe that whatever power the Congress has a right to exercise in its own proper person or presence it may delegate to a committee or commission, especially when subject in a degree to its own revision. But to yield a high preporative of the House of Representatives, required and imposed by rogative of the House of Representatives, required and imposed by the Constitution to be exercised in a certain contingency in vindicating the judgment of the people, I, as one of their long-trusted and honored representatives, cannot consent to do. I might willingly yield my own individual right, but that of the people I regard as a trust of more sacred character.

I believe, sir, that Tilden and Hendricks have been fairly and legally elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and by a popular majority of nearly three hundred thousand freemen. by a popular majority of hearly times indirect thousand freemen. I believe the two Houses of Congress have the right to count the votes and determine whether there has been an election or no election by the electoral college, and in the latter event that the House of Representatives is bound to exercise its constitutional function, to elect the President, and the Senate, under the same provision of the Constitution, to elect the Vice-President. I would enforce these high functions, and let consequences take care of themselves.

These are my convictions, and I must act up to them. If I should be wrong, I shall at least be acquitted in conscience, and that will be be wrong, I shan at least be additized in conscience, and that will be a consoling balm, whatever betides myself or my country. But, sir, this bill was prepared by able and patriotic men; it seems to be indorsed by many of the wisest and best men of both parties; and the people have already largely accepted it as the best solution of the embarrassing question. Upon them let the responsibility fall; I will not take it. I trust that, should this commission be appointed, as is most likely it will be, its deliberations will result in establishing the verdict of the great people we represent, and in any event I pray God that the Republic will still live in fact as well as name and always overshadow a free people.

FIELD.]
Mr. FIELD. Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to participate in exhausted, the members are imthis debate, but the argument is exhausted, the members are impatient to vote, and no words from me are needed. I have watched the progress of this bill with intense interest; for, while I thought it beyond question within the competence of Congress, I was sure that it was a just and honorable settlement and the best method of escape from an impending calamity.

And while I shall take no part in further discussion I cannot re-

And while I shall take no part in further discussion I cannot refrain from expressing my admiration of the fidelity, the courage, coupled with moderation, of the members of the joint committee from both parties and in both Houses of Congress.

When the bill was reported I looked with anxiety for the first expressions of opinion from the country and for the first debates in Congress. The opinions from the country have come to us with an approach to unanimity which no man can mistake. And on Wednesday night when the Senate sat to debate for the last time and to decide the question, I looked often to the flag floating over their Chamber to see if it was still flying. There it floated all through the night-watches till the daylight came, and as the sun rose over the snow lighting up this Capitol from basement to dome the flag was knew that the day was won. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr.

BROWN.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this is a supreme hour in the history of the Republic; never perhaps was there one so big with its fate. Within the brief time allowed me by the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] I cannot attempt an argument, but I wish to put on record a word of indorsement of this bill. I am for it. Before me, sir, I see the foot-prints of those whom I am not afraid to follow. I believe this measure constitutional and that it will prove a peaceful solution of our political difficulties. More than that, I have confidence in the integrity of the tribunal which we are to establish by this bill. More than that, too, I have undoubt-

we are to establish by this bill. More than that, too, I have indonoting faith in the cause of my party to be submitted to their decision, and, with these convictions, give it hearty support.

More than forty millions of people in the cities, hamlets, workshops, and fields of this broad land have their eyes turned toward us this day, and every patriot among them hopes for the preservation of the fabric of Government builded by our fathers. The merchant, banker, fabric of Government builded by our fathers. The merchant, banker, trader, farmer, lawyer, citizens of every vocation, are vitally interested in our work, for the prosperity of their business and their political rights depend upon the public peace and maintenance of law. If this bill involved the surrender of any constitutional right which honor and duty dictated should be jealously and inviolably held, I should scout it; but I feel sure that it does not. Defeat it, and we are afloat on the mad current of political passions, with agreement between rival parties rendered impossible, and drifting on to the breakers, where victory by either may be the death of the Constitu-

A month ago I almost despaired of the Republic. I thought I saw a gigantic conspiracy against liberty. The deliberate utterances of the leaders of the opposition made a year ago were repudiated by their authors; established joint rules of Congress made by the republicans themselves and acted under for years were declared no longer operative. We have heard and seen them deride laws of their own making and turn their backs upon the usages, precedents, and traditions of the Government. We heard the note of military preparations; the Legislatures of sovereign States were put under the supervision of corporals of the guard, and by a leading newspaper organ in this city the arrest of the representatives of the people in this Chamber, who should dare, in a certain contingency, to perform their constitu-tional duty, was defiantly advocated. I know of nobody who was intimidated. There was a calm, earnest resolution to meet the situation as oath and honor demanded. The other day we saw a singular spasm of devotien to State rights. Men here proclaimed that it would be a great outrage upon the Constitution if the House should require the members of the thrice-branded returning board of Louisiana to furnish for inspection to one of our committees the record of their proceedings in the count of the presidential vote. Yet these same gentlemen knew that on that very day—and it is the fact this day—the disputed chief-magistracy of that sovereign Commonwealth, indeed its precious autonomy, hung for its disposal upon the vacillating will and caprice of the President of the United States. The same is true also of South Carolina.

same is true also of South Carolina.

It is said that "history is philosophy teaching by example," and the last fifteen years are full of bad examples to be recorded by the remorseless pen of the coming Tacitus or Macaulay of our land.

There is not a man anywhere who will have the hardihood to deny that the vote in the late presidential election, as cast, showed a majority of a quarter of a million for Tilden. Deducting the votes of the negroes, a majority of a million of the white voters cast their ballots for Tilden. I believe he was elected—honestly, squarely. It is denied and fraud and intimidation charged. Without some fair and honorable settlement of the dispute, the industries of the country honorable settlement of the dispute, the industries of the country must remain paralyzed for weeks longer, as they have been for months past, with the public mind full of unrest and apprehension, and with the ultimate danger of civil war impending.

I have thought, sir, at times that the bloody necessity would be forced upon the more than four millions of men who voted for the democratic candidate for the Presidency to attempt his inauguration, but I rejoice that there is a most substantial promise that patriotic statesmanship will triumph. We have seen men of both parties sacrifice upon the altar of public safety their partisan prejudices and nobly join together in a plan for the salvation of our country. Such moderation is a virtue fanaticism never forgives.

I hoper them for this, the country is grateful for it; their works are the country is grateful for it; their works are the country is grateful for it; their works are the country in the country is grateful for it; their works are the country in the country is grateful for it; their works are the country in the country is grateful for it; their works are the country in the country is grateful for it; their works are the country in the country in the country is grateful for it.

I honor them for this; the country is grateful for it; their work will be triumphant and historical, and they will have the gratitude of coming generations of men.

The product of their labors is before us. It clears the horizon round us. We can see the shore and are nearing it, and are to escape the storm whose hoarse and angry mutterings we have heard.

As I have said, I believe the bill to be constitutional. If I did not, no possible considerations could influence me to support it. I do not hesitate to follow the cautious pioneers who have shaped its provisions. They are men of wisdom, of great love of country, of integrity trusted, and worthy of trust. If I had a doubt of its constitutionality I should bend my judgment and resolve it upon the side of arbitration and peace for God has said "Blessed are the peace-makers."

The adoption of this compromise, if I may so call it, will be a new proof, I trust, of the stability of our institutions. Such excitement and commotion as we have had in this political contest would have resulted in civil war and in the downfall of almost any government on earth save this. Now we send forth to our countrymen assurances of hope and renewed confidence in the perpetuity of the Constitution of our fathers.

The section of country to which I belong—the South—standing as she does almost broken-hearted and in the weeds of mourning over her beloved dead, stricken with poverty, property wrecked, and her liberties outraged, but ever bearing herself with majestic dignity in her woes; brave, as all the wide world knows, yet moderate, patient, and forbearing when pushed almost into the depths of despair—I say, sir, if she can be assured that the day approaches when she shall be sir, if she can be assured that the day approaches when she shall be harried no longer, but have her rights and equality in the Government recognized and protected, her brow will be lifted up radiant with the glowing inspiration of her heart, born of joy for her liberation, with courageous faith in a high destiny, and that land will again be the garden that it was, and not the waste that it is.

I have said I have faith in the cause of my party. Let truth prevail, the right conquer; let fraud be hunted down and rebuked. I want no victory founded upon injustice and wrong. I believe Tilden has won, and nothing hardly short of omnipotence could make me believe otherwise; but such is my confidence in the integrity of the believe otherwise; but such is my confidence in the integrity of the tribunal to be erected by this bill that I am willing to trust the whole case to their examination and arbitrament.

I believe this to be a great day's work for the people; and when the electric wires shall flash the glad news of what we have done to the anxious and listening millions behind us, I believe it will receive the indorsement of the calm judgment of good men from one end of the land to the other.

To save a republic, save it in honor, justice, and truth, from the calamity of lost liberty and dire horrors of internecine war; to give repose to its people, peace to its homes, confidence in business, and to command order and obedience to law throughout its limits—this is the grandest and holiest work that man can do for his fellow-man;

and, believing that this bill will secure all of these precious results for my countrymen, I rejoice that it is my good fortune to be an humble participant in this legislation.

I trust that my hopes are not too ardent; and should they prove well grounded, then the second century of our national life will open most auspiciously in their consummation. The gray mountains, the eternal sentinels of God, will shake their crowns to the valleys; the valleys will smile to the seas, and the seas will rush up to kiss the shores, and the very material elements will mingle with the gladness of a rescued people rejoicing in the fact that the Constitution and shores, and the very material elements will mingle with the gladness of a rescued people, rejoicing in the fact that the Constitution and Union, are to live, and preserve for all men of every color and nativity the blessings of liberty regulated by law.

And shall it be said that to assist in accomplishing this for a great people will degrade the Supreme Court? Why, sir, it will decorate the judges of that court with robes brighter with honor than their own unsullied ermine to leave their august position and mingle as a part of this tribunal which is to decide, as was said by an eloquent Senator, "the greatest dispute that was ever had in the world." If they can but adjust these difficulties to the satisfaction of the people—and I believe the people will accept their judgment—it will alone —and I believe the people will accept their judgment—it will alone be worth more than they have ever done in the past or can ever do in the future, even if there were to be vouchsafed to them an existence as far reaching in its span as that of the patriarchs of old. Mr. GIBSON. No portion of the people of this country have witmr. GISSON. No portion of the people of this country have witnessed the proceedings of this Congress with more anxiety and with a deeper interest than the people of Louisiana. They have been taught, sir, by the vicissitudes of a harsh fortune that, I trust, the people of every other State of the Union may long be strangers to, that there can be no liberty except that regulated by law, and no peace that shall bring prosperity except that sheltered by free institutions, and that the bayonet affords no remedy for grievances under our American system. And in viewing the settlement of this great ques-American system. And in viewing the settlement of this great question agitating the whole American people and occupying the best minds of Congress, they feel the assurance that they will find relief in the honesty, in the intelligence, in the wisdom of this high commission organized, as I think it is, in the exercise of the constitutional powers of the Congress of the United States. The paper which I have had the honor to submit speaks the sentiments of the people of Louisities and which is the people of Louisities and the people of Louisit ana, a people at once high spirited and chivalric, but conservative, law-abiding, and inspired by the most unselfish and exalted patriotism. I thank my friend from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] for the courtesy he has extended to me in allowing me an opportunity to call the attention of the country to the views of the leading men of the metropolis of the South

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it is with inexpressible relief to me that I now approach the moment of the consummation of this great measure of statesmanship and public policy. From the hour when, under the direction of this House, the Speaker assigned six others with myself—to act with a similar committee of the Senate—to the important duty of considering whether there were some legislative or constitutional mode of adjusting the difficulties and the perils that oppress and environ the nation, I have known no moment of ease or rest. From the moment when I first met in that committee with those gentlemen, distinguished as they are for their position in this House and before the country, knowing that as public men and as partisans we have differed widely, but with conscientiousness and with firmness; when I saw that the hopes of the nation were centered upon this joint committee of Congress, and that upon their wisdom, their forbearance, their patriotism, their statesmanship, hung the stability of society and of business from one end of this country to the other, I have felt a weight upon my spirits, and have seen no relief until this hour of deliverance under the blessing of God has at last come.

Men talk frequently of the dangers of the situation. Gentlemen scout at the idea of civil war, and valorously hurl their defiance at intimidation or attempt to menace them or control their actions as public men. A moment's consideration will satisfy every reflective and candid mind that there was not only danger before us of dissension and strife, but that that dissension and strife would culminate in a civil war—and a civil war with which none among the modern or the ancient republics can be brought into comparison.

I respect the conscientious scruples of every gentleman on this floor who has studied the Constitution and feels himself bound by his oath to support it. Upon one side it is said that the Constitution has given the President of the Senate the power to count the electoral vote; and, therefore, gentlemen entertaining that idea protest against this bill because it divests the President of the Senate of his constitutional rights; and they say that outside of legislation we can go on in the way we have progressed some twenty-two times before in counting the presidential vote and that they will be content with that. But after the demolition of this idea of the President of the Senate being vested with this power, which has received some right valiant blows both here and at the other end of the Capitol, he will be a bold man, however radical and however extreme his politics who, hereafter will stand up in this House or at the other end of the Capitol claiming that under the Constitution the President of the Senate has the right to count the presidential votes. That is exploded and forever ex-ploded by the highest legal authority in this country. But the gen-tlemen who entertain that idea with entire consistency oppose this

There is not a line in this bill, there is not a line in the report accompanying the bill, but what ignores and repudiates entirely and absolutely the idea that the President of the Senate has any power absolutely the idea that the President of the Senate has any power to count the vote. Who believes that the framers of the Constitution—who aimed to make this Vice-President a mere shadow, an officer of the least possible consequence in the Government, having no power, having no patronage, of no consequence except as a figure-head presiding over a respectable body of elderly gentlemen in the other wing of the Capitol—he has not the power to appoint a page in his body; he is a sort of corps de reserve in the contingency of the death or removal of the President, to step into his shoes, and beyond that of no earthly consequence—who, I say, in his sober reflection, believes that the framers of the Constitution ever intended that that man should count the vote for President? As was suggested yesterday by my friend in the course of his argument, these gentlemen day by my friend in the course of his argument, these gentlemen claiming so much for this officer would read the Constitution something in this way:

"The President of the Senate shall open the certificates in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, and shall count himself in as President of the United States."

That is the way they would read the Constitution. But I pass over that. This bill repudiates that idea, rejects it altogether. Those who vote for the bill certainly do not believe that the Constitution has given this power to the President of the Senate; for if it is given to the President of the Senate Congress cannot take it from him. So much for that side of the question.

To my friends here who would go on and count the vote in the old way by the same world. You were that the true House shell have way, let me say a word. You propose that the two Houses shall have nothing to say about it, except to grace the proceeding with their dignified presence; they have nothing to say about the count of the

As to the claim that the President of the Senate, against the protest of both Houses of Congress, can count the votes and declare the result, and that the successful candidate is to be inaugurated as President, it ought to be a sufficient answer to say that the great majority of the people of the United States would regard that as a bold and unjustifiable usurpation of power, and unless compelled by the strong arm of power the people of the United States would never acquiesce arm of power the people of the United States would never acquiesce in or recognize any such usurped power. This grand army of the republic, twenty-two hundred strong, I believe, or as many of them as can be excused from police duty throughout the Republic, would not stand very much in the way of the people carrying into execution their indignant rejection of such a claim.

Now let me come to the other side of the House, for I have a word to say to those democrats who say that the Constitution is sufficient in itself, that we do not need this legislation. You reject this claim set up on behalf of the President of the Senate, and you say that this set up on behalf of the President of the Senate, and you say that this set up on benair of the Fresident of the Senate, and you say that this power is in the two Houses of Congress. I grant you that the two Houses of Congress possess this power, that their power in this regard is co-equal. I do not grant you that the power of the House is greater than that of the Senate, nor do I believe that claim can be maintained. But grant that it is equal to the Senate; will you tell me how you are to count the vote for President on the second Wednesday of February next under the present law? Why, sir, we have no law. The twenty-second joint rule has been repealed on the part of the Senate.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DANIEL H. KELLY-VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States: To the Senate of the United States:

I have the honor to return herewith, without my approval, Senate bill No. 685, entitled "An act to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry.

The reasons for withholding my signature to this bill may be found in the accompanying report received from the Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

Washington City, January 24, 1877.

Sir: I have the honor to return herewith Senate bill 685, "to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry," with the report of the Adjutant-General, as follows:

The inclosed act directs the Secretary of War to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry, to date December 1, 1861.

There is no record of the enlistment, service, or death of this man on file in this office, and if this act becomes a law, as it now reads, it will be of no benefit to the heirs.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON.

To the PRESIDENT.

Mr. WITHERS. There is no record of enlistment, the report states, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no record of enlistment.

Mr. COCKRELL. This bill was reported by a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I believe, the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. CLAYTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and printed, if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS. Mr. DORSEY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Arkansas; which was read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

Whereas a detachment of United States troops are stationed at the Hot Springs, in this State, with the purpose, it is supposed, of ejecting the settlers and occupants from the Government reservation at that place, which would entail much suffering and distress upon four thousand of our fellow-citizens: Therefore, Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be earnestly requested to procure, as early as possible, some action by Congress which will avert this military necessity until some final disposition is made of the property by Congress.

D. L. KILLGORE, Speaker of the House of Representatives. J. K JONES, President of the Senate.

Approved January 17, 1877.

W. R. MILLER, Governor of the State of Arkansas.

Mr. CRAGIN presented a petition of citizens of Maine, members of the Legislature thereof, praying that Greenleaf Cilley, commander United States Navy, retired, be restored to the active list of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a resolution of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of speedy legislation to prevent settlers on the Hot Springs reservation from being ejected therefrom until some final disposition is made of said property by Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition numerously signed by ship-owners and others, of Thomaston, Maine, praying the passage of House bill No. 2685, providing for the distribution of the Geneva award fund; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 912) for the relief of Thomas H. Halsey, paymaster United States Army, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1192) to construe section 12 of an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and the several amendments of said section, and to determine the relation of the main line and branches; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1195) granting a pension to Nathaniel Johnson Coffin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the petition of Mrs. Mary Walsh, praying for a pension, be withdrawn from the files and returned to the petitioner.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. George M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4530) to amend sections 5185 and 5186 of the Revised Statutes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 2461) for the relief of certain officers of the Third United States Artillery who suffered by fire at Fort Hamilton, New York, on the 3d of March, 1875; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SOUTHERN CLAIMS COMMISSION.

Mr. WRIGHT. It will be remembered that on Wednesday morning last I reported from the Committee on Claims a bill to extend for two years the act establishing the board of commissioners of claims and the acts relating thereto. Unless there be some objection, this morning, in view of the number of Senators present, I should like very much to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of that bill.

much to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the bill?

Mr. WRIGHT. It was reported on Wednesday morning. The bill is to extend the time of the southern claims commission to two years after the 10th of March next. If that bill is to be passed at this session, it is important to have action as soon as possible. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of Senators to the rule. One objection to a motion prevents the presiding officer from entertaining a motion to go to the Calendar within the morning hour. For that reason the Chair puts the question "Is there objection to the motion?" If the motion is put, it is then subject to the Senate. Is there objection to this motion? The Chair hears none. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill? sideration of the bill?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1128) to extend for two years the act establishing the board of commissioners of claims and the acts relating thereto.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the sections of law read to Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the sections of law read to which the bill refers.

Mr. WRIGHT. Those sections are the provisions of the appropriation bill of 1871, which created this commission.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the date?

Mr. WRIGHT. Eighteen hundred and seventy-one. The bill was passed on the 3d of March, 1871. That act created this commission and gave it life for two years, as I now remember. This is an exact copy of the subsequent law that we passed extending the time for four years. It is found, I may state, that there are a large number of cases before this commission in which the testimony has been taken and the cases are awaiting adjudication by the commission, and if this commission is not extended all these cases must fall, and all the this commission is not extended all these cases must fall, and all the evidence that has been taken will avail nothing, evidence that has been taken on the part of the Government as well as upon the part of the claimants. It is believed that to extend the time of this commission for two years will enable them to dispose of the business before these. fore them fore them.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to inquire whether this bill contemplates the filing of new claims?

Mr. WRIGHT. Not at all. The time has long since expired for filing claims by the express provisions of law. This bill only keeps in life the commission to adjudicate the cases that are now before it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That ought to be made very clear. I suppose the committee have looked to that.

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly. The law itself expressly provides that no claim shall be filed after a certain time. This bill merely continues in life the commission to adjudicate the claims they have reported. I may say to the Senator from Ohio that not a few applications have

I may say to the Senator from Ohio that not a few applications have been made to us to have a provision extending the time for filing new claims, but we have unanimously refused to make any such provision

Mr. SHERMAN. Would the Senator have any objection to inserting a proviso in his own words to the effect "that nothing herein contained shall be held in any way to authorize any new claims to be presented?"

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly not. I have no objection to that.
Mr. SHERMAN. I should be quite willing if the Senator would draw it himself, because he is more familiar with the law than I am.
Mr. WRIGHT. If the Senator thinks there is any doubt about it, and that out of abundant caution such a proviso had better be inserted, I am quite willing to move it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the only reason why I called attention to it, because I supposed it extended the jurisdiction of the court so as to receive new cases.

Mr. WRIGHT. Not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would offer an amendment, but I prefer that the Senator should take time to draw it, as he is more familiar with the subject than I am. Such an amendment as I suggest would simply provide that "nothing herein contained should be construed to extend the jurisdiction of said court or permit any claims to be filed."

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to my friend whether this will answer the purpose:

the purpose:

Provided. That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to extend the time for filing claims before said commission or to enlarge its jurisdiction.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know but that that will answer. Mr. EDMUNDS. "Or to authorize the filing of new claims," I sug-

Mr. EDMUNDS. I guess that will do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I guess that will do it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. A great deal was said during the last summer and fall about the country being plundered and the Treasury bankrupted by southern claims. A great deal was said without any sufficient warrant for it; but certainly what was said created no little apprehension in the minds of the people of this country that they were in danger of being plundered by claims that ought not to be allowed. Now, here is a commission that has been sitting for several years; I do not remember for how many; for three or four years has it not? do not remember for how many; for three or four years, has it not?

Mr. WRIGHT. Six years.
Mr. THURMAN. Six years. And before I vote to extend that commission I should like to be better informed than I now am, why they have not completed their work. I should like to know better they have not completed their work. I should like to know better than I know now why three or four gentlemen, skillful and competent men, have not been able in six years to pass upon all the valid claims that could be presented to them.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, if my friend from Ohio had referred to the report of this commission he would have found that the whole number of claims that have been presented within the time allowed by law, that is, from the 3d of March, 1871, to the 3d of March, 1873, was 22,298, and before this report was made they had reported upon as allowed or disallowed 9,222, and they reported at that time 1,866. They had therefore reported within that time 11,088 claims, leaving the whole number still pending and undecided 11,210. The commissioners in their report further say that "of this number of 11,210 pending claims there are about 1,850 in which the claimants have taken their evidence and submitted them for decision; and of these about 1,500 are suspended for investigation by agents or for further evidence. In about one thousand cases the evidence has been taken in part, but the claimants desire to take further testimony. In the in part, but the claimants desire to take further testimony. In the remaining cases, being about 8,359, no evidence has been taken; and of these about 650 are for amounts larger than $10,000;" and in that class of cases the witnesses have to be brought before the commission and examined in person at this place. In all claims under $10,000 they can have testimony taken by agents in the field. Therefore it appears that of the claims in which all the evidence has been taken, and which are submitted for decision, there are about 1,851, according to which are submitted for decision, there are about 1,851, according to this report; and claims in which part of the evidence has been taken, but which are not yet ready to be submitted, there are about one thousand; and claims in which no evidence has been taken, 8,359.

Now, the commissioners are of the opinion, as I understand, that within the two years they can dispose of the remaining cases upon their calendar. I believe no one pretends but that this commission have calendar. I believe no one pretends but that this commission have been very diligent, very industrious, and very careful in the examination of claims. It appears that of the whole number of claims submitted to them since their last report, prior to the report that is now before Congress, they disallowed $3,790,245.29, and that they allowed but $474,632, and this is about in the proportion in which they have allowed and disallowed claims from the time the commission started. It will be seen that in a very large proportion of the claims that are now before them no evidence has been taken whatever, and the chances are that no evidence will be taken; and taking all the cases that are now before them in which evidence has been taken, and which they are now considering, and in which evidence has been taken in part, it is believed that they can complete their labors within the next two years.

Mr. THURMAN. I think that in any judicial court in this country if the parties had taken no steps to prove their case within the three years or nearly four years that these persons have had to produce evidence, the court would strike the cases from the docket. I do not evidence, the court would strike the cases from the docket. I do not see for myself upon this statement why these eight thousand cases toward the preparation of which, toward the proof of which, not a single step has been taken, should not have been stricken from the docket of this commission before this time. However, I do not propose to enter into a discussion of this bill at all. The Senator from Iowa, who I know is a careful man and always watchful of the public interests and the public Treasury, thinks the bill ought to pass. I can only say that I am not satisfied that it ought to pass with my present lights, and I shall therefore vote against it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the amendment of the Senator from Iowa has been agreed to.

Iowa has been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been agreed to.
Mr. SHERMAN. It had better be read again.
The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Provided. That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to extend the time for filing claims before said commission, or to enlarge its jurisdiction, or to authorize the filing of new claims.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If an amendment is in order, I move to insert after the amendment just adopted the following:

Nor shall any new evidence be received, and all cases in which no evidence has been filed shall be stricken from the docket.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest to the honorable Senator from Virginia that if the first part of his amendment were adopted it would prevent the United States, in resisting a claim which is already supported by affirmative evidence on file, from taking any evidence to contradict it. I hardly think he can mean to do that.

Mr. JOHNSTOM. I simply mean to refer to the evidence on the part of the claimants, and I will modify my amendment by inserting after "evidence" the words "on the part of the claimant."

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to have the amendment reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment just adopted the following:

adopted the following: Nor shall any new evidence on the part of the claimant be received, and all cases in which no evidence has been filed shall be stricken from the docket.

In which no evidence has been filed shall be stricken from the docket.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to suggest to my friend from Virginia that it seems to me the amendment as he proposes it might operate unjustly and very harshly upon claimants. It would exclude additional evidence in any case on the part of claimants. They may have been ever so diligent in the preparation of their cases, and the case may have been held up by reason of inquiries being made by the agents of the Government; and, without any fault upon the part of the claimants at all, the full evidence may not have been presented. It seems to me that this matter ought to be left fairly and justly to the commission. I have no fear that this commission will do otherwise than what is right upon this matter of evidence; and to say that they shall not receive evidence from claimants in any case whatever, I they shall not receive evidence from claimants in any case what ever, I think would be wrong; for I can well conceive that there may be many very meritorious cases where the evidence, without any fault upon the part of the claimant, had not been perfected, and, if you pass this amendment, they are concluded absolutely from receiving such evidence.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think when a commission has been in existence for five years as this has been, and parties have had that length of time to file their evidence and have failed to do so, they ought to be excluded from any further permission to do it. Certainly a man who has a case in court who cannot get it ready and will not try to get it ready in five years must be guilty of great neglect. I do not think that the public courts ought to be kept open for the benefit of suitors and claimants who have been guilty of laches in the preparation of their cases. I am not very much inclined for one to vote for this bill, anyhow; but if I shall do so, certainly I desire it to be as much guarded as possible and to confine the duties of the court to the decision of those cases in which the evidence is already in. Where the parties have been diligent and where they have failed simply for want of time on the part of the court, the case is different; but I am not disposed for one to allow parties who have had their cases filed for years now after this lapse of time to bring in the testimony.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if we are to direct these commissioners to dismiss from the docket the claims which are already filed, but which have not been prosecuted by evidence, the first question that arises in my mind is what then becomes the legal or legislative that arises in my mind is what then becomes the legal or legislative status of those claimants. All these claimants are now prevented from appealing to the two Houses of Congress for general relief according to the pressure they can bring to bear upon Members and Senators and so on, by force of the law which obliges them to go to this commission. Now, if we direct this commission, without giving them a trial on the merits or without condemning their claim in the due course of their own regulations for want of prosecution, but by an absolute act of legislative will which commands them, to dismiss every claim that has not been prosecuted do we not immediately recovery absolute act of legislative will which commands them, to dismiss every claim that has not been prosecuted, do we not immediately re-open the doors of the Legislature for the flood of all these claims? The question is whether it will be conducive to public interest to have this mass of slow claims made the subject of constant appeals to Congress, as they of course will be if we take this step. It does not appear to me that it would be wise. These people could say with a good deal of show of reason, "You have not given us an opportunity to try our claims in this court; you have sent us there and have authorized the court itself to make its own rules and regulations; we have not fallen under the condemnation of those rules and regulations. have not fallen under the condemnation of those rules and regulations, because if we had we should have been disposed of already for want of prosecution; but now by an arbitrary act of legislative will you withdraw the consideration of these claims from this commission without a hearing on their merits, and we therefore have a right to appeal to your sense of justice to hear these claims yourselves." And the longer the time goes with such a claim unheard and disposed of the larger it grows and the more doubtful and perhaps the more untrue is the evidence that is brought to support it. I should much prefer, therefore, in extending this commission, to leave the commission with the same power it has now to definitively decide a case against a party for want of prosecution, which would be a bar to it just as much as a decision on the merits would be. But our will cannot justly make a bar to their claims by saying that they shall be dismissed from the docket, as it seems to me. So that if I were a claim agent in this town or elsewhere, and wished my clients to have the best chance of getting the most money, I should be very glad indeed to have this provision striking these claims that are so difficult of proof that the parties have not commenced to take testimony right out of that Calhave not fallen under the condemnation of those rules and regulations, parties have not commenced to take testimony right out of that Calendar, in order that they might be the subject of co-operative pressure in the two Houses of Congress. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to take up House bill No. 4306, being the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 4306) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. Unless there be objection, I ask that the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations may be considered as we go along.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to considering the amendments as they are reached in the reading of the bill? The Chair hears none, and that course will be pursued.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was after line 12 to insert:

was after line 12 to insert:

For additional pay of professors for length of service, $6,700.
For pay of one instructor of practical military engineering, in addition to pay as first lieutenant, $900.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, yesterday I was absent from the Senate on business of the Senate. During my absence I understand the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] made a speech, taking for a text some few remarks that I had made the morning before. I learned during the course of his speech that he was so speaking, but I was so busily engaged that I could not attend in the Senate in order to hear what he might say. I find the speech is not yet published in the RECORD.

I wish to give notice that at some proper time, if there seems to be occasion, I shall take some further notice of the remarks he made.

EXECUTORS OF WILLIAM LLOYD.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 824.

tion of Senate bill No. 824.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 824) for the relief of Hannah L. Lloyd, as executrix, and George W. King, executor of William Lloyd, deceased, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Hannah L. Lloyd, executrix, and George W. King, executor, of William Lloyd, deceased, of $582.55, being the balance paid into the Treasury, after costs and expenses, arising from the sale of one-fourth interest in the brig Fanny, to which it appears they are entitled.

Mr. BURNSIDE. There is a report which may be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. Caperton, from the Committee on Claims, on the 15th of May, 1876:

The Chief Clerk read the following reports submitted by Mr. Caperton, from the Committee on Claims, on the 15th of May, 1876:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Hannah L. Lloydaking for remnneration for property seized and sold by the United States, having considered the same, submit the following report:

The petitioner prays compensation for one-fourth interest in the brig Fanny, seized by the United States marshal at New York City in 1862, and sold under decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, in December, 1862, in conformity with sixth section of the act of the Congress of the United States, approved July 13, 1801, entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes." The petition states that the brig Fanny. Captain Wicks, left Charleston, South Carolina, on the 16th day of October, 1860, bound for Boston, from which port she left for New Orleans; and, after remaining at New Orleans "a few weeks," sailed for England, arriving at Liverpool on the 27th day of November, 1861. Captain Wicks presented his papers to the United States consul, who, inding the Fanny was a Charleston boat, declined to return his papers, and forwarded them to Washington, where Captain Wicks followed, and obtained permission of the United States Government to bring the brig to New York. Arriving at New York, the United States marshal seized the Fanny as the property of the estate of William E. Lloyd and George W. King, of Charleston, South Carolina, and the brig, in December, 1862, was sold by decree of United States district court for the southern district of New York.

The petitioner claims remuneration, as the widow of William Lloyd, deceased, for one fourth interest of said Lloyd, deceased, in said brig Fanny thus condemmed and sold. Certified opies of the record of the United States district court for the southern district of New York for November term, 1862, filed with petition, shows the libeling of one ha

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. George M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

AGREEMENT WITH SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 1185.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1185) to ratify an agreement with certain bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians, and also with the northern Arapaho and Cheyenne Indians.

Mr. ALLISON. Unless some Senator desires the reading of the agreement, I think it might be waived. The agreement has been long since printed in a document sent here by the President. It is recited in the bill at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No Senator insisting, the reading of that part of the bill will be waived.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill under consideration provides for the ratification and confirmation of this agreement with the exception of article 4, which is in the following words:

ticle 4, which is in the following words:

ARTICLE 4. The Government of the United States and the said Indians, being mutually desirous that the latter shall be located in a country where they may eventually become self-supporting and acquire the arts of civilized life, it is therefore agreed that the said Indians shall select a delegation of five or more chiefs and principal men from each band, who shall, without delay, visit the Indian Territory under the guidance and protection of suitable persons, to be appointed for that purpose by the Department of the Interior, with a view to selecting therein a permanent home for the said Indians. If such delegation shall make a selection which shall be satisfactory to themselves, the people whom they represent, and to the United States, then the said Indians agree that they will remove to the country so selected within one year from this date. And the said Indians do further agree in all things to submit themselves to such beneficent plans as the Government may provide for them in the selection of a country suitable for a permanent home, where they may live like white men.

The letter postion of a winde 6 contains in lines 192, 193, 194, and

The latter portion of article 6 contains in lines 122, 123, 124, and 125 of the printed bill the following words:

And if said Indians shall remove to said Indian Territory as hereinbefore provided, the Government shall erect for each of the principal chiefs a good and comfortable dwelling house.

The fourth article having been specially excepted from ratification by the terms of the bill, it is necessary that that portion of article 6 should also be excepted. I therefore move to amend by adding after the word "four," in line nine, "and also the following portion of article 6," including the words I have already read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment as proposed.

ment as proposed.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "four," in line nine of the bill, it is proposed to insert:

And also excepting the following portion of article 6: "And if said Indians shall remove to said Indian Territory as hereinbefore provided, the Government shall erect for each of the principal chiefs a good and comfortable dwelling-house."

Mr. ALLISON. I trust the Senator from Kansas will not insist upon this amendment. It is not at all material to the object he has in view. The fourth article of this treaty is the only article which provides for the transfer of these Indians to the Indian Territory. The fourth article is excepted by the terms of the bill, because these tribes themselves have not agreed to it, and it can have no binding force unless they all do agree to it under the treaty of 1868 which is

Mr. DORSEY. If the Indians should agree to that, would the Government then be forced to transfer them to the Indian Territory?

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all. Of course these Indians cannot be transferred to the Indian Territory except in pursuance of legislation hereafter to be made, even if the whole of this treaty should be ratified and confirmed by the Senate and House and agreed to by the Indians. But by the terms of this bill, and by the terms of the agreement itself these Indians cannot be removed to the Indian Territory. ment itself, these Indians cannot be removed to the Indian Territory without a further agreement and without further legislation. Therefore I see no object in the Senator from Kansas insisting upon the modification of article 6; and especially do I think it ought not to be done, because it interferes with the agreement as made by the In-The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and | dians, and they might probably say if article 6 is to be interfered with, which has already been agreed to by all these bands, they are not bound by the agreement thus modified without their assent; but as the bill now stands it is in precise accord with the agreement that the commissioners made with the Sioux Indians; but it in no respect has the effect which the Senator from Kansas seems to think it would have-to tacitly, at least, admit their right to go to the Indian Terri-

Mr. INGALLS. I have listened with pleasure, as I always do, but not with as much instruction as I frequently do, to the Senator from Iowa. I hope, if he has any reasons that are satisfactory or convincing to offer why my amendment should not prevail, that before he concludes he will present them to the Senate for consideration. He admits that the only provision of this agreement which can give the latter portion of article 6 any binding effect whatever is specially excepted from the operation of this act by the terms of the bill itself. He intimates that my desire is to prevent any tacit understanding or implication that may arise from this language by which there shall be assumed to be any consent expressed for the removal of the Sioux to the Indian country; but if article 4 is stricken out, never having been assented to by the Indians, then I ask him for what purpose he been assented to by the Indians, then I ask him for what purpose he desires to have the latter portion of article 6 retained in this bill. It certainly implies in unmistakable terms that there is in contemplation a removal of these Indians to the Indian Territory, and declares that, if they do so remove, the Government shall erect for each of the principal chiefs a good and comfortable dwelling-house. As the language now stands in the bill with article 4 stricken out or omitted, these words are either superflower or they are distant on a the Conference of the conf guage now stands in the bill with article 4 stricken out or omitted, these words are either superfluous or they are sinister, or, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Bogy] suggests, they are nonsensical, and I am willing to accept that as an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, it is certainly no fault of mine that I have not been able to convince my friend from Kansas that this provision ought not to be stricken out. This agreement is of no force and is not binding upon either party until it is ratified by Congress and by the Executive. Article 4 was only agreed to by two bands of these Judians and therefore article 4 has not been agreed to by the these Indians, and, therefore, article 4 has not been agreed to by two bands of Indians, but article 6 has been agreed to by all of them, and, therefore, it is a binding agreement on the part of the Indians now. If we change its terms they may say "We will not assent to such change," and the whole agreement would fall, or at least it might be doubtful whether they would be bound by the agreement if we undertake to change its provisions. It is now binding on them.

Mr. INGALLS. But not binding until ratified by Congress and the President.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course not; they have agreed to this sixth article. If Congress agrees to it and the President agrees to it, then it is binding on the part of the United States, and consequently binding on the part of this Sioux Nation; but if we refuse to ratify a portion of this agreement, the Indians can very well say "You did not agree to the agreement made with these commissioners and, therefore, we ourselves will not be bound by it."

Mr. DORSEY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa if article 4 has been stricken out?

Mr. ALLISON. It is excepted from ratification by the bill.
Mr. DORSEY. Then I should like to know what reference lines 123, 124 and 125, in article 6 have, if article 4 has been stricken out. These lines are:

And if said Indians shall remove to said Indian Territory, as hereinbefore provided, the Government shall erect for each of the principal chiefs a good and comfortable dwelling house.

The "hereinbefore" referred-to provision in these lines is article 4, which has been stricken out. If there is no intention by this bill to remove these Indians to the Indian Territory, I cannot see the necessity of these four lines.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Arkansas has exactly comprehended the situation; that is to say, these four lines have no effect whatever in law, and yet the Senator from Kansas insists that they must go out. I suppose he thinks they ought to go out, because, if they do not go out, under this bill these Indians can be removed to the Indian Territory. I do not so understand it, and therefore I can see no force in the objection made by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DORSEY. Ido not know what the motives of the Senator from Kansas are for asking that these lines be stricken out. I desire them Kansas are for asking that these lines be stricken out. I desire that stricken out because I want nothing whatever in this bill, by implication or otherwise, which would show that at this time Congress these Indians to the Indian Territory. That is my notion about it.

Mr. BOGY. If the fourth article of this agreement is stricken out. Mr. BOGY. If the fourth article of this agreement is stricken out, as a matter of course the amendment indicated by the Senator from Kansas should be adopted, because it is a part of the same subject, although not in the same section. It ought to be in the same section; but it is the same subject, and the Indians cannot object. As was said by the Senator from Iowa, all these different bands of Indians did not agree to the fourth article. A few of them did. The Ogallalla Sioux and the Brûlé Sioux agreed to this fourth article. The others did not. The fourth article provides that if the bands which I have just mentioned desire to go to the Indian Territory west of Arkansas and south of Kansas, and adjoining my State, they may do so, and in that eventhouses shall be built for the principal chiefs whenever they desire them. If the right to go there be taken away, certainly there ought to be no provision to build houses for them; but, as I said awhile ago, it really would be nonsensical to retain this provision if the main subject is taken away.

I agreed to this compact with a good deal of hesitation. Nevertheless, if this fourth article be stricken out, which I repeat provides for and confers on the Indians the right to remove to the Indian Territory, I am willing to vote for the agreement; but I do insist that as a matter of propriety the amendment of the Senator from Kansas should also be adopted, and I cannot see that the Indians could object to it at all, because if the two bands with whom this agreement was made to remove to the Indian Territory agree that that right be taken from them to remove there, they certainly would not object to this amendment of the Senator from Kansas. The other Indians to whom this provision was not intended to apply can make no objection, because this provision will not apply to those Indians who have no connection whatever with any right secured by the fourth article of the agreement. I do not think the objection of the Senator from Iowa is at all well taken. It is a part of the same subject, and if the fourth article is stricken out, as it ought to be, and with which I will not oppose the agreement, the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, as a matter of course, ought to be adopted. There ought to be nothing, as the Senator from Arkansas said, left in this bill which indicates by implication in the remotest way that at any time these wild tribes may have the right to go down to the Indian Territory. I therefore hope the amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be adopted. It seems to me that there can be no objective. tion to it of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CLAYTON. The only objection I have to striking out this provision is that if we interfere with this agreement it may be necessary to have the Indians again ratify it. It seems to me that the provision which the Senator from Kansas proposes to strike out, while not in harmony with the other provisions of the bill, at the same time is harmless, because if you strike out the fourth article which authorizes the Indians to go to the Indian Territory, so that there is no authority for them to go there then of source this posture. there is no authority for them to go there, then of course this authority for the erection of buildings for them is of no force whatever.

If this was an original proposition, an ordinary bill which did not require ratification and agreement, I should say strike it out, so as to make the phraseology harmonious, but as the phraseology of this sixth article which is proposed to be stricken out is entirely harmless and can lead to no result whatever, I should rather, with the views I have on the subject, see it remain, because I should like this bill to go into force without any further ratification on the part of the Indians

Mr. BOGY. The Senator does not understand my position. I contend that all these different bands of Indians excepting two have nothing to do with the portion of the agreement proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Kansas; because it was not provided that houses should be built for any of these Indians except the two bands who have agreed to the fourth article. They cannot go now; and, therefore, as this is virtually a part of the fourth article, with the same idea, the same compact, the same agreement, though awkwardly put in another section, it should be stricken out. It cannot affect the other Indians, because it does not apply to them.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. Does the Senator think, after striking out the fourth article, the effect of which is to prohibit any of these Indians from going to the Indian Territory, the Government can under the other provision erect buildings for those who go to the Indian Territory? Does not the striking out of the fourth article render this other portion entirely nugatory?

Mr. BOGY. Of course it does.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then what is the necessity for the amendment?

Mr. BOGY. Of course it does; and that is the reason why it should be stricken out. There is an implication left there that these Indians may hereafter at some time by possibility go down there. I, for one, am opposed to allowing the wild Indians of the prairies to go at any time to the Indian Territory; and I will oppose here and at all times any tendency in that way. It can do no harm to strike this out, and it does not require the assent of the Indians. I am very well satisfied that it does not, because this is not part of the compact made with them. There are nine tribes of these Indians. The other seven tribes fied that it does not, because this is not part of the compact made with them. There are nine tribes of these Indians. The other seven tribes did not make any compact in regard to going to this Indian Territory, and therefore it does not apply to them. The two tribes, or more correctly the two bands, that have agreed to the fourth article will have to agree to this modification made by Congress anyhow.

Mr. CLAYTON. But if the Senator will allow me, all the bands agreed to article 6. Now he proposes to amend article 6. If you amend it in any particular, will it not require their ratification?

Mr. BOGY. It is true they have all agreed to article 6; but when article 6 was written out it was intended that the Indians should agree to remove to the Indian Territory. Out of a number of different ment with all the different tribes of the Sioux Indians by which they were to relinquish their reservation lying on the two forks from Cheyenne River with the right to remove to the Indian Territory west of Arkansas. That was the intention on the part of the commissioners when this compact was first drawn. The Indians would not go down there, but two of the bands did agree to go, but the wording remains there, but two of the bands did agree to go, but the wording remains as if applicable to all. Now if you strike out the fourth article you ought to strike out these words which are part and parcel of the same subject, the same idea; that is, if the Indians should go down there it should be the duty of the Government to build houses for them. Now if you say the Indians shall not go, there ought to be no obligation on the part of the Government to build houses. It is correct to say that if they cannot go no houses will be built; but why keep that in the agreement? It may be mischievous hereafter, and there can be no harm in striking it out, the fourth article having been striken out.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to make a suggestion. It is said those words should go out because article 4 goes out, and article 4 refers to the Indian Territory and the removal to that Territory. That is not exactly a conclusive argument in favor of striking these words out, because if article 4 be stricken out and these words be retained they would remain as an offer to the Indians on the part of the Government that if they should remove to the Indian Territory the Government would do for them what is provided for in the words that are sought to be stricken out. Whether there is any necessity for keeping that standing offer on the part of the Government, I do not know.

standing offer on the part of the Government, I do not know.

Mr. INGALLS. That is what we want to avoid.

Mr. THURMAN. If it is not advisable to keep that a standing offer on the part of the Government, then I should suppose that if article 4 goes out these words should go out; but if it is advisable to keep that as a standing offer on the part of the Government, then these words ought to be retained, changing the word "said" before "Indians" in line 122 into the word "the," because the Indian Territory has not been mentioned before except in article 4, which is stricken out.

I feel very indifferent about this matter because I do not know

I feel very indifferent about this matter because I do not know enough of the subject to be able to give any advice upon it; and I rose more to ask the Senator from Iowa who has the bill in charge whether this treaty comes to us with a recommendation by the Ex-ecutive and the Indian Department that it be adopted?

Mr. ALLISON. The President of the United States has sent a message transmitting it to us.

Mr. THURMAN. Recommending its ratification?

Mr. ALLISON. Recommending it.

Mr. THURMAN, Then I suppose I am to understand of course that it comes from the Committee on Indian Affairs with its recommendation?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir, it was looked at very thoroughly in the committee, by my honorable friend from Kentucky who is not here.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I desire to enter my earnest protest against the removal of any of the wild Indians into what is known as the Indian Territory. There is perhaps not within the limits of as the Indian Territory. There is perhaps not within the limits of the United States any soil, any country for agricultural and pastoral purposes superior to what is known as the Indian Territory. It is oc-cupied by tribes which for more than half a century have been civil-ized and progressing in wealth and intelligence, having their own schools, their own churches, their own forms of government assimilschools, their own churches, their own forms of government assimilating as near as their nature will admit to those of their white brethren. They are placing themselves rapidly in a condition to become, if they desire to become, a State of the American Union. Every element such as that which is designed by this bill to be injected among the inhabitants of that Territory injures those people in their efforts to elevate themselves in wealth and in a condition to become in the progress of time citizens of the American Republic.

to elevate themselves in wealth and in a condition to become in the progress of time citizens of the American Republic.

Now, sir, this Territory is immediately south of the State of Kansas, directly interested in this question, and which is opposed, I take it from the position assumed by her able Senator on this floor, [Mr. Ingalls,] to such a course. It is west of the State of Arkansas; those people are directly interested in this question; and it is north of the State of Texas. There are three great States directly interested in this question; and this Indian Territory is now crossed by a railway leading directly through that Territory from the north connecting with the Northern States by the way of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas road with the Gulf of Mexico on the south. In the very nature of things, if those people who now occupy that Territory are not loaded with this fearful fog of ignorance and savagery, they will increase in wealth, intelligence, and prosperity. The people of these three States now get along on terms of friendship with the Indians who occupy that country; and if you turn these wild tribes loose into that country, no man can tell what will be the consequences.

For this reason I oppose the entire policy, and the people whom I represent oppose the policy of placing any of these wild tribes, under any circumstances, within that Territory, because it is not only injurious to those who now occupy that Territory and who are neighbors of ours, but it is injurious to our own people in every sense of the word. I oppose the whole policy.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President I have long been aware of a fixed.

word. I oppose the whole policy.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I have long been aware of a fixed, resolute, and immovable determination on the part of the Indian Bureau and some other branches of this Government to remove the wild tribes of the Northwest into the Indian Territory. I was a little surprised at the readiness with which the Senator from Iowa and those who agree with him in the Indian policy of this Administration assented to the exception of article 4 from the provisions of this bill. I had not observed the terms of the latter portion of article 6. An I had not observed the terms of the latter portion of article 6. An examination of that fully discloses the reason why they were so very willing that article 4 should be excepted because, as the Senator from Ohio has well said, if that is retained it is a standing invitation to those Indians to go to the Indian Territory, and a statement, by implication at least, that if they do go the United States Government will offer them a home and provide for their permanent location.

Now, sir, the Senator from Texas has expressed what I believe to be the sentiment of the people of that State in regard to the location of these Indians in that country. I can speak with equal certainty as to what the sentiment of the people of Kansas is. I believe that as to what the sentiment of the people of Kansas is. I believe that the people of Arkansas and Missouri are equally opposed to this movement, and I can say to the Senator from Iowa that any movement that looks even by implication or that favors even by the remotest inference any policy that has for its object the removal and location of the Sioux into the Indian Territory will meet I believe practically with the unanimous opposition of the people and the representatives of those States.

The Senator from Ohio well says that if it is the desire of the Senate to extend a standing invitation to these Indians to go to the Indian Territory, then the latter portion of article 6 should be retained; if that is not the purpose, then it should be omitted from the ratification. The Senator from Iowa has the option before him ratification. The Senator from Iowa has the option before him either by adhering to the retention of that portion of the article to extend that invitation to these Indians, or by allowing it to be stricken out to show that he was sincere in his consent to the omission of article 4. I believe that he was entirely sincere, but at the same time, as I said when I commenced, I am aware of the fact that there is a deliberate purpose on the part of the Indian Bureau to remove these Indians down there, and I have no hesitation in saying that if this language is retained after the declarations that have been made here upon the floor the Department will consider that they are authorized to continue their negotiatious for this purpose. I therefore hope the Senate will agree to my amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. I would call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that the fourth article is stricken out, and if this arof the family makes a solection of a homestead in the reservation, and then it goes on to say that he may make a selection in the Indian Territory. If it is the honest purpose to strike out the Indian Territory, then this should go with it; and, if it is not the honest purpose to strike out the Indian Territory, or, in other words, not to permit them to go there, then this is a piece of deception. Under any state of the case it should go out.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is a little singular that my friend from Mr. ALLISON. I think it is a little singular that my friend from Kansas should suppose that I had some secret purpose in assenting so readily to the obliteration of article 4. I beg leave to assure him that I had no secret purpose. I, like himself, did not observe at the moment this provision in article 6, and therefore that provision was not discussed at all. Now, for myself, I desire in good faith to preserve the understanding we had in the committee or in our informal conferences, if I may use that term, that inasmuch as there were serious differences with reference to the removal of these Indians to the Indian Territory, we would not raise that question in this bill were serious differences with reference to the removal of these Indians to the Indian Territory, we would not raise that question in this bill, it not being a practicable question, inasmuch as the Indians themselves do not assent to removal. It is an imperative necessity that so much of this agreement as provides for the relinquishment of that vast area of territory which lies west of this boundary should be at once placed in the possession and under the control of the Government of the United States, and that can only be done by giving the force and effect of our sanction to this bill.

I am willing, as I have no doubt the Senator from Kansas is willing, that the question of the removal of these wild tribes may be post-poned until some future action of this Congress or of a future Congress, it may be. Therefore, I desire, in good faith, to carry out the understanding of the committee, and now, I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that we modify still further the amendment proposed by him, and that the amendment as modified be then agreed to. There is a portion of this article 4 that ought to be saved in this bill, and the Indians only refused to ratify that portion of the article 4 which relates to the removal to the Indian Territory.

Mr. PADDOCK. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to express the opinion of the committee in reference to this surrender of the fourth article and the sixth article together? Do I understand him that he presents now the view of the committee in reference to that surrender? because I consider it an absolute surrender of any that surrender? because I consider it an absolute surrender of any possible chance, any option that may be given in either of those articles for removal ultimately to the Indian Territory. So far as I am concerned, I consider article 4 one of the most important and needful sections of the whole bill, and if the chairman surrenders that, I am willing to surrender the whole treaty so far as I am concerned. I think these Indians ought to go to the Indian Territory. I think that is where they belong. I think they ought to be placed under the civilizing influence of Indians further advanced in civilization than they are. There is a vast scope of country of sufficient extent there for all the Indians of the country. There is no looky to be in there for all the Indians of the country. There is nobody to be injured or damaged in the least degree by their removal there; the objections interjected here are altogether imaginary, and not real.

Mr. ALLISON. I thought I made myself understood with refer-Mr. ALLISON. I thought I made myself understood with reference to this fourth article. The Indians themselves have not agreed to go to the Indian Territory, and we made a solemn treaty with them in 1868 that no treaty which looked to the relinquishment of any portion of their reservation should be binding upon those Indians until they themselves agreed to its surrender. Now only two bands of these Indians have agreed in any event to go to the Indian Territory. The remainder of these bands, comprising two-thirds of these Indians, in this agreement which we are ratifying, especially excepted the provisions of the fourth article so far as they related to the Indian Territory. Are we to violate our faith with this Sioux Nation still further by compelling them to surrender these valuable lands, made valuable by the discovery of mineral products there; are we still to force them against their will and judgment into the Indian Territory by the power of the United States without preparation on their part?

For one, sir, I regard this as no surrender. I represent no interest with reference to this subject other than what I believe to be the true interests of the Government and the Indians. The committee agreed unanimously that under this treaty we had no power to force these people into the Indian Territory against their consent. They have not consented; and are we now to force them by a legislative provision to consent to this thing because at this very moment we desire a large portion of their possessions? No, sir, I desire to carry out in good faith the provisions of the treaty of 1868 and the provisions in good faith the provisions of the freaty of 1898 and the provisions of the agreement made here by eminent men and by men who have the real interests of these Indians at heart, not by those who wish to compel these Indians to go to a Territory where they do not desire to go, until such time, at least, as they and the Government can agree upon a policy. I will be glad to see the time come when they will go there voluntarily and be in such position with reference to civilization as will enable them to affiliate with the more civilized tribes now

Mr. PADDOCK. Why, Mr. President, I understand the Chairman to have said several times that there was really nothing in the articles compelling the Indians to go at all. It was merely a matter of a mutual option to the Indians and to the Government whereby this result might be accomplished at some future time, if it should be found to be desirable and satisfactory to all interests involved and to all the parties interested. So that my friend, I think, has wasted a great deal of breath and power here in stating a proposition which he had himself before admitted not to be as he has described it to be

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to ask the chairman of the committee a question in connection with the bill generally, whether it is proposed by this bill to send these wild, uncivilized Indians into the Indian Territory without consulting the civilized Indians upon the subject at all, and whether, in good faith, if the United States have the power

Mr. ALLISON. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina, I will say that the bill does not propose in any event to send them there; and therefore we did not consider the question whether we ever ought to agree to send them there without the consent of the

Mr. THURMAN. I understood the Senator from Iowa to say first this morning that the fourth article was to come out entirely.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee so reported, but I am willing to modify that by excepting "such portion of article 4 as relates to the removal of said Indians to the Indian Territory," to insert that in

Mr. THURMAN. The whole of article 4 relates to the removal of the Indians to the Indian Territory.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will pardon me. I think not the whole

Mr. THURMAN. What part does not?
Mr. ALLISON. The last part.
Mr. THURMAN. I think not. I think article 4 entirely relates to the same subject. I have no idea that the last clause of article 4 can be taken as an independent substantive proposition. If that were so, then the Indians have put themselves absolutely in the power of the Government to send them wheresoever the Government shall please. That surely never was intended.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Government choose to send them to some other Territory than the Indian Territory, could not the Government do so under the last clause of article 4?

Mr. THURMAN. I think not. I think to make that a distinct substantive provision would allow the Government to provide in its own discretion a country suitable for a permanent home for these Indians and would be an assent on the part of the Indians beforehand to go to that country and submit themselves to such plan as the Government might see fit to adopt, whereas the true meaning of this section is that if the Indians elect to go to the Indian Territory, then they will take such place in that Indian Territory as the Government may provide for them, and being there, will submit themselves to such beneficent plans as the Government may provide. That is the meaning of it. You cannot take part of article 4 and leave the rest. You must reject it all or save it all; and that being the case, it seems to me there is no necessity for further discussion. Article 4 goes out, and lines 122 to 125 in article 6, which the Senator from Kansas, I understand, moves to strike out, having relation to article 4 and to nothing else heing a part of it, and in foot a part that ought to have nothing else, being a part of it, and in fact a part that ought to have been in article 4 if the agreement had been a little more artistically drawn, ought also to come out.

I hope we shall come to a vote. I do not wish to call for the reg-

I hope we shall come to a vote. The not wish to can for the regular order; but I hope we shall come to a vote.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator from North Carolina, I think, interposed an objection that the civilized Indians, Indians now living in the Indian Territory, might hereafter object to the coming among them of these Sioux Indians, these wild tribes, as they are denomthem of these Sioux Indians, these wild tribes, as they are denominated. There are two or three tribes of Indians in my own State, one of which has already partially moved, on the invitation of those Indians, to that Territory. A delegation from another tribe has gone there and they have received a similar invitation to go among them and locate there, and, as I understand it, there is no objection, no disinclination on the part of the Indians of the Indian Territory who are so far advanced in civilization to have these Indians come among them. They feel a deep interest in these Indians; they want to help to better their condition if it is possible to do so; and they are willing to lend themselves to that effort I understand. It seems to willing to lend themselves to that effort I understand. It seems to me that of all the sections of this bill, this section 4 and section 6 are most advisable. I sincerely hope that the amendment may not prevai.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, upon further reflection, and after having heard the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, I am of the opinion that to leave in this provision of article 6 would be to leave the question open as to whather these Indians should go to the Iddians.

the question open as to whether these Indians should go to the Indian Territory. I do not think it advisable now to raise that question. I believe the committee were unanimous in that idea, that the question as to whether these Indians should be removed to the Indian Terri-tory ought not to be raised in this bill, for the reason that the great majority of the tribes declined to go in this agreement; and therefore it is not the right time now to raise that question. For that reason I shall vote to strike out the provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment The PRESIDENT pro tempore. of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. ALLISON. I am so anxious that this matter shall be disposed of to-day that I would rather assent to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas than to have the matter go over.

Mr. MERRIMON. Why is it necessary to strike out articles 4 and 6?
Mr. THURMAN. Because they are not to be ratified.
Mr. PADDOCK. It is necessary, because these gentlemen who live in that section of the country are determined that the door ought to be closed absolutely and entirely against the removal of these Indians to the Indian Territory. That is all the necessity there is, Mr. BOGY. Not at all; only it does not open it, that is all. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD ACTS.

I call for the regular order. Mr. EDMUNDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is Senate bill No.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 934) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line

"An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not propose to make an argument on this bill to-day, but I hope the Senate will indulge me in doing all that I can to speed the bill without doing injustice to any other Senators will listen to its reading, for the recitals in the preamble to the bill are of great importance to the understanding of the bill ble to the bill are of great importance to the understanding of the bill and the bill itself ought to be understood by every Senator before he comes to vote upon it. After the reading of the bill I shall then ask that the report of the committee accompanying the bill, which is not very long, may be read so as to show briefly the grounds upon which the committee recommend the bill to the favorable consideration of the committee recommend the bill to the ravorable consideration of Congress. That being done, I understand that the chairman of the Railroad Committee will move the bill last reported by that committee as a substitute for the bill now under consideration, and that will bring to the attention of the Senate the points of difference between your two committees, both committees recommending measures tween your two committees, both committees recommending measures for the creation of a sinking fund which shall protect the Government from loss and the creditors of these corporations from loss, but differing in the details. The whole point of difference will be before the Senate by the motion to substitute the Railroad Committee bill for that of the Judiciary Committee. That motion being made, then I hope the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL,] who is opposed to the bill of the Judiciary Committee, will give us the benefit of his views, so that we may know and be prepared to answer them when the bill shall come up again. After he shall have concluded his remarks-and I invoke the attention of the Senate to all that is to be done on this very important subject—this day after he shall have concluded his remarks I shall be willing that we adjourn so that it may be the unfinished business on Monday. I now ask that the bill may be read.

Mr. WEST. The Senator from Ohio has very accurately stated the two different phases in which this subject will be presented for the consideration of the Senate, one in the report of the Judiciary Committee, accompanied by a bill, and another in a bill and report coming from the Committee on Railroads, one committee differing from the other upon a fundamental principle; but I shall reserve to my-self discretion and judgment as to when I will offer the motion for

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. But after the bill is read that the Senator has referred to and the report of the Judiciary Committee, I shall then claim the attention of the Senate to the bill reported by the Committee on Railroads and to their report, so that the whole subject can be before the Senate at the same time.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no objection in the world to that course. All I desire is that both bills may be read, so that the attention of the Senate may be brought to the points of difference between your committees, and that then the Senator from Oregon shall be heard in his objections to the power that the Judiciary Committee assert to amend

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that I am willing to go on to-day after the reading of both these reports, but would prefer to speak on Monday, if it is all the same to the Senator from Ohio; and the only reason for this preference on my part arises from the fact that I am chairman of a subcommittee engaged in taking testimony and we are very much crowded for time. Still if the Senator insists, as we had some talk on the matter, I shall go on

Mr. THURMAN. I would most willingly do anything to oblige the Senator from Oregon, as he well knows, but this session is nearly at an end. If the electoral bill shall receive the approval of the President, the execution of it will begin next Tuesday in part by the selection of the committees on the part of the Senate and House, and the full and complete execution of it will commence on Thursday. We know under these circumstances how difficult it will be to perfect any measure so important as this, and we ought not to lose any time upon it. A bill passed the House of Representatives at the last

The Judiciary Committee reported their bill, which is in its substantial features the same as the House bill, and in the opinion of the Judiciary Committee an improvement upon the House bill, as long as the 12th of July last. I tried to get that bill up at the end of the last session, and I tried it several times; but in the closing days of that session, after we had been sitting here seven months and everybody was fatigued and many were sick, when there was that multibody was ratifued and many were sick, when there was that intitude of business that is always pressing upon Congress at the close of a session, I found it impossible to get the measure up. This session I tried to get it up three weeks ago, but owing to the absorption of the attention of the Senate by the electoral question I have never been able to get it up. I do not want to lose this day, and I trust that my friend from Oregon will consent to go on to-day, so that I may ask a vote of the Senate on this bill on Monday next, or at farthest on Theeder. thest on Tuesday

Mr. MITCHELL. I will endeavor to accommodate the views of the Senator

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will now be read. The Secretary read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

A message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. U.S. Grant, jr., his Secretary.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I am satisfied that further reading to-day, the Senate being so completely worn out and fatigued from the labors of the last few days, would be a waste of time. I shall not therefore ask for any further reading on this subject now, but as this is a subject of great importance, a question whether or not the Government shall lose more than $100,000,000, or at least it may be such a question, I hope that Senators will give their attention to it. I hope that they will get copies of Senate bill No. 984, reported from the Judiciary Committee, and of Senate bill No. 1134, reported from the Railroad Committee; and that they will get the reports made by those two committees.

those two committees.

Mr. WEST. Report No. 341, of the last session.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, it was reported at the last session; and there was also a most elaborate and instructive report made in the House was also a most elaborate and instructive report made in the House of Representatives by Mr. Lawrence from the Committee on the Judiciary there, and a minority report of that committee made by Mr. Hurd. These reports will explain the general features of the case and most of the details, so that whoever shall make himself familiar with them and will read the two bills will then see the only points of difference between your two committees. Believing that it would be useless to protract the reading any longer, after the Senator from Oregon has taken the floor so as to give him the right to the floor on Monday, I shall move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MERRIMON in the chair.) The Chair will state that the bill just read is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendments.

Committee of the Whole, and open to amendments.

Mr. THURMAN. Before adjourning, however, if the message of the President is to the open Senate and not an executive message, I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an executive message.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.
Mr. MITCHELL. I will now give way to a motion to adjourn.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4530) to amend sections 5185 and 5186 of the Revised Statutes was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, so as to have the message from the President read.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at one o'clock and thirty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 27, 1877.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journals of Thursday and Friday were read and approved.

DESTITUTE POOR OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee for the District of Columbia the bill (H. R. No. 4473) for the relief of the destitute poor of the District of Columbia. It is a bill which I am satisfied no gentleman will object to when I state its contents. It appropriates the sum of $20,000 for the relief of the destitute poor in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. Before consent is given, as the House is very thin, I trust the bill will be reported at the Clerk's desk so that it may be understood.

Inderstood.

The bill was read.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask also that the petition which I hold in my hand may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not propose to object, although I wish to reserve the right to do so for a moment. This appropriation is out of the regular order of appropriations of money, and there is scarcely a graphy of the House present.

the regular order of appropriations of money, and there is scarcely a quorum of the House present.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let me say to the gentleman that there is an imperative necessity for the passage of the bill, for there is absolute starvation in this city.

Mr. HOLMAN. Many gentlemen are detained from the House this morning by engagements which will expire in a few moments, and I think that a bill that appropriates money in this form should be brought up when there should be an opportunity for all gentlemen to be present, and concur or not, as they desire. The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STEVENSON] at a later hour in the day.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. While submitting that motion, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that it is of the first importance to the Government that a bill should be reported and acted on to-day in regard to the appropriation of half a million of dollars for the payment to Captain James B. Eads of the amount due him for the completion (so far as the first provision of the act requires the completion) of what is known as the improvement at the mouth the completion (so far as the first provision of the act requires the completion) of what is known as the improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi River. But I am exceedingly anxious that the subject should be well understood by the House, and hence I do not wish to bring it forward until the House is full. Therefore I make the motion for the present that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed with the consideration of the Indian approximate it. priation bill.

SPECIAL TAXES ON NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to present (the gentleman from Indiana yields to me for that purpose) a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, and 1,500 bankers and merchants, in favor of the repeal of all special taxes on national banks. I ask that this memorial be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures.

There being no objection it was ordered accordingly. The petition is as follows:

is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The petition of the undersigned respectfully showeth: That war taxes, both heavy and unequal in their burden, are imposed on the national banks, State banks, savings-banks, and private bankers of this country, which taxes have been, for several years, productive of great commercial injury; that in no other country are such taxes incurred by the business of banking, and the exigency having passed away the war taxes can be taken off without any sacrifice to the Treasury at all commensurate with the benefits which will result to the agricultural, financial, commercial, and industrial pursuits of the country.

That the continuance of this onerous and discriminating taxation on banking capital is rapidly withdrawing it from that business, leaving the commerce and industries of the country illy prepared to meet a long-hoped-for returning tide of prosperity.

That the present time is a proper one for Congress to interfere for the relief of these interests; that the taxes now levied by the General Government on the deposits and capital of all banks should be immediately repealed, and the subject of bank taxation be remitted to the several States and Territories, as before the war.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LYNDE. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] will withdraw his motion until certain witnesses who are in the cuswill withdraw his motion until certain witnesses who are in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms can be brought before the bar of the House to answer for contempt.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is, of course, a matter which takes precedence; but I am reminded, and would remind the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE,] that a great many members who would desire to be present when the matter is called up are now absent.

Mr. GOODIN. I hope that the gentleman from Indiana will not insist upon going into Committee of the Whole until we have had the morning hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the House ought to consent to finish the Indian appropriation bill before taking up any other business.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM COLORADO.

I ask consent to make a privileged report. The Committee on the Judiciary have directed me to report back the follow ing resolution with reference to the credentials of James B. Belford as Representative from Colorado:

Resolved, That Colorado is a State of this Union, and that James B. Belford, Representative-elect from said State, be sworn and admitted to his seat as such.

I give notice that immediately after the reading of the Journal next Tuesday I will call up this report for consideration, and after three hours' debate will move the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the gentleman from Kentucky will not ask three hours' debate on that subject. I suggest two hours.

The SPEAKER. That is all within the control of the House.

THOMAS KEARNEY.

Mr. BRIGHT, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee of Claims the bill (H. R. No. 1747) for the relief of Thomas Kearney, collector of customs for the district of Corpus Christi; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

SIMON WOLF.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee of Claims, for reference to the Committee on Appropriations, a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the claim of Simon Wolf, recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia, to be re-imbursed the amount expended by him for recordbooks for his office for the years 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman should not refer that to the Committee of Communication of the Committee of Communication of the Committee of Communication of C mittee on Appropriations. I must object.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Indiana objects, the report cannot be made at this time.

GEORGE R. WELSH.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent to have the Committee of Claims discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4402) for the relief of George R. Welsh, of Beaver Falls, Pennsyl-vania, that it may be referred to the Committee on War Claims. Mr. HURLBUT. I must object to any further references now.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. HATCHER in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4452) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

Mr. MILLS. When this bill was up before a portion of it with reference to the Sioux Indians was passed over to enable me to offer an amendment

Mr. HOLMAN. We will go back to that. Let us first finish the remainder of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

CIVILIZATION AND SUBSISTENCE OF INDIANS ON THE MALHEUR RESERVATION.

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary in the purchase of goods, subsistence, stores, &c., for the Indians collected on the Malheur reservation, Oregon, in instructing them in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, providing employés, educating children, procuring medicines and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, or in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, $25,000.

Mr. LANE. I should like to know whether this is in accordance with the recommendation from the Indian Bureau. In my judgment it is entirely too large an appropriation for this purpose. I think $20,000 would be an adequate sum, and therefore I move, in line 1240, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty;" so it will read "$20,000."

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection to that amend-

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. If the gentleman deems that a sufficient sum, of course I will propose no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MODOCS.

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary to provide, under the direction of the Secretary having jurisdiction of Indian affairs, settlements, clothing, food, agricultural implements, and seeds for the Modoc Indians that have been removed to, and are now residing within, the Indian Territory, $7.000.

That the sum of $2.000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the benefit of the Tonkawa Indians now at the military post of Fort Griffin, Texas; that the money herein appropriated shall be expended for the benefit of said Indians by the commanding officer at Fort Griffin, under such directions as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs: Provided, That no part of such find shall be applied to the removal of said Indians from the vicinity of such military post to any Indian reservation: And provided further. That such appropriation shall be applied pro rata to such Lipan Indians as may have heretofore been incorporated into the Tonkawa tribe, and which still reside with such tribe.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Let me ask of the gentleman from Mis-

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Let me ask of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Wells,] who is in charge of this bill, what is the number of these Modocs?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I am informed they number from one

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I am informed they number from one hundred and fifty to two hundred.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. The reason for my inquiry is this: Seven thousand dollars is appropriated in this bill for these Modocs, while only $2,000 is appropriated for the Tonkawas. Now, there are about one hundred and thirty of these Tonkawas, and if the committee would consent I should like to increase this appropriation for these Indians $500. I think it is absolutely necessary it should be increased to their property. to that amount.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Two thousand dollars was the amount appropriated in the last appropriation bill for these Indians and the committee believed that is a sufficient sum. The gentleman from Texas, however, is of course more familiar with the wants of these Indians.

Mr. HANCOCK. The appropriation for last year was only for a part of the year and these Indians did not get it until it was late, while, on the contrary, the appropriation here provided for is for the whole year. I think the appropriation should be increased $500.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I do not object to the increase of the appropriation $500, if the gentlemen who are more familiar with the wants of these Indians deem it necessary.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that when I was at Fort Griffin, and this money has to be expended under the direction of the commanding officer. I was informed that the sum of was at Fort Griffin, and this money has to be expended under the direction of the commanding officer, I was informed that the sum of $2,000 was not sufficient. I only ask to increase the amount $500. I believe the gentleman from Missouri does not object.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Then I move to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,500" for the benefit of the Tonkawa Indians now at the military post at Fort Griffin, Texas.

The appendment was extreed to

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TRANSPORTATION.

For the necessary expenses of transportation of such goods, provisions, and other articles for the various tribes of Indians provided for by this act, $200,000. Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I have an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to offer at that point which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:
Add the following:

And whenever practicable, wagen transportation may be performed by Indian labor; and wheneveritis so performed, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to hire a storehouse at any railroad whenever necessary, and to employ a storekeeper therefor; and to furnish in advance the Indians who will do the transportation with wagens and harness, all the expenses incurred under this provision to be paid out of this appropriation: Provided, That hereafter contracts involving an expenditure of more than $2,000 shall be advertised and let to the lowest responsible bidder.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is to be paid out of the foregoing appropri-

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. It is part of that paragraph and cannot be paid out of any other fund. The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To complete the survey of the lands of the Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, the Secretary of the Interior, as directed by the act of Congress approved 22d day of June, 1874, is hereby authorized to expend the sum of $4,000, to be paid out of the moneys placed to the credit of the eastern band of Cherokee Indians upon the books of the Treasury Department under act of August 15, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes."

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I move to strike out the following words in line 16 after the word "dollars:"

To be paid out of the moneys placed to the credit of the eastern band of Cherokee Indians upon the books of the Treasury Department under act of August 15, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tibes, for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes."

Mr. HOLMAN. That amendment is equivalent to striking out the whole of the paragraph.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I propose only to strike out that part which taxes these Indians with the amount required to make this survey.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order, but I suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that if he strikes out those words it will leave this paragraph without any appropriation of money to carry

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Without the words which the gentleman proposes to strike out, there will be no appropriation to complete the surveys of the lands of the Cherokee Indians of North Carlina as proposed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman might as well move to strike out

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman inight as the whole paragraph.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. The gentleman is mistaken, because the Secretary of the Interior in this paragraph is authorized to expend the sum of $4,000 to complete the survey of the lands of the Cherokee Indians of North Carolina.

Mr. HOLMAN. But this is an appropriation of money to be paid

Mr. HOLMAN. But this is an appropriation of money to be paint out of the Indian funds. Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. In the Forty-third Congress an appropriation was made for surveying the Indian lands, and the Indians were not charged with the amount. I see no good reason why the eastern band of Cherokee Indians should be charged with this amount. castern band of Cherokee Indians should be charged with this amount. There are many reasons why they should not be so charged. These lands were acquired in consequence of a judgment purchased by the Indian Department from William H. Thomas, of North Carolina. It was made contrary to the wishes of the Indians and the understanding was, and it was announced at the time, that the eastern band of Cherokee Indians were not to be taxed with the amount necessary to make this survey. I think it is well to finish up the survey; but the amount ought not to be charged to the Indian fund held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOLMAN. But my friend will see that to strike out the words

Mr. HOLMAN. But my friend will see that to strike out the words proposed to be stricken out simply strikes out the appropriation. He might as well strike out the whole paragraph as this part of it. If he prefers to strike out the whole paragraph, I have no objection, and I presume the gentleman having charge of the bill has none.

But I wish to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that this provision is put into the bill at the instance of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who thinks it is right. These lands, some seventy thousand acres, belong to these Indians. They have also funds held by the Federal Government in trust for them; and it is entirely proper and in harmony with our system of making surveys. funds held by the Federal Government in trust for them; and it is entirely proper and in harmony with our system of making surveys at the expense of the persons interested, that this survey should be made at their expense. It is very clear that it ought not to be made at the expense of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana why then was it that an appropriation was made in the Forty-third Congress to survey the 70,000 acres he alludes to, the Indians not being taxed at all for the purpose?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will answer that question to the entire satisfaction of the gentleman from North Carolina.

tion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

tion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

By an inadvertence, rather than by an intentional act, these private surveys were made during the Forty-third Congress by a provision of law incorporated into the sundry-civil bill, in the first session of that Congress, if I remember correctly, out of the public Treasury. But in the first session of this Congress we restored the old practice providing that the persons interested in these surveys should incur the expense; and this survey of the Indian lands is placed on the same footing with the survey of other private land claims. And my friend must bear in mind that it is entirely safe to take the views of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon a question like this.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the amendment I have offered and offer, instead of it, what I send to

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at line 1313, after the words "North Carolina," the words "recently acquired from W. H. Thomas by purchase;" and by striking out at line 1316 "$4,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,500."

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that.
Mr. DIBRELL. I move further to amend by inserting after the words "North Carolina," in line 1313, the words "Tennessee and Georgia." The lands in those States adjoin those of the Cherokee Georgia." The lands in those States adjoin those of the Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, and I desire that the provision for their survey may be included in the same paragraph.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. The Indians in Tennessee and Georgia do not own any lands that are proposed to be surveyed now. Consequently the gentleman's amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me say to the gentleman from Tennessee that this paragraph is for a survey of the lands of these Indians in North Carolina at their own expense.

Carolina at their own expense.

Mr. DIBRELL. I withdraw my amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. VANCE of North Carolina, it was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I also offer the amendment which send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 1324 insert the following:
"Of this amount to pay Marcus Erwin, of Asheville, North Carolina, for services as attorney in examining the papers in the purchase of a judgment on W.H. Thomas of Pennsylvania, of the North Carolina Cherokees, $300."

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I raise the point of order on that amend-

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. What point of order?
Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. That it is new legislation.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will waive the point of order. I propose to have it paid out of their own money. I will add to the amendment these words:

To be paid out of the moneys placed to the credit of the eastern band of Chero-ees upon the books of the Treasury Department, August 18, 1876.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Has the gentleman any communication from the Indian Department recommending this?

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I have. I send to the desk to be read a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Department of the Interior, Office of Indian Affairs, Washington, January 22, 1877.

Washington, January 22, 1877.

Sin: Acknowledging the receipt by your reference of House bill No. 4195 for the relief of Marcus Erwin, of North Carolina, I have to state that United States Agent W. C. McCarthy, July 3, 1875, was authorized to engage the legal services of Mr. Erwin in the examination of titles to certain lands taken in satisfaction of judgment in favor of William Johnston against William H. Thomas, and designated in act of Congress approved August 14, 1876, and to expend from funds in his hands the necessary amount for such service. As, however, by Department decision the funds in the agent's hands could not be applied to such service, Mr. Erwin was not paid, and as the labor has been performed and the amount charged therefor appears reasonable and just, the bill is herewith returned and respectfully recommended to favorable consideration.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. Q. SMITH,

J. Q. SMITH, Commissioner.

Hon. R. B. VANCE, House of Representatives.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. As this money is to be paid out of the fund of these Indians, I have no objection to the amendment.

fund of these Indians, I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to go back to the preceding paragraph that I may offer an amendment. I was called out of the Hall, and the paragraph was passed in my absence. I hope there will be no objection to going back for that purpose.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. After the statement the gentleman has made, I shall not object to going back to the paragraph.

The Clark read the following paragraph:

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For continuing the collection of statistics and historical data respecting the Indians of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $2,500.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the following amendment: In line 1310 strike out "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,500."

The amount recommended by the Indian Department is $3,500. That is $1,500 less than the gentleman asked for who is in charge of this very important and interesting work, and the sum that is provided in this bill is wholly inadequate. I trust there will be no objection to the increase of this amount by adding $1,000.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The estimate for this purpose was $3,500, but the Committee on Appropriations thought that that sum was too large and have recommended an appropriation of $2,500.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would say that within the past year this work has been in advancing stages and a larger sum is required, and that $3,500 will be inadequate for the purpose and $2,500 is wholly insufficient to carry out the work which now begins to show itself in its results. The amount recommended by the Indian Department is $3,500. That Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The Committee on Appropriations have Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The Committee on Appropriations have been obliged to say in this case, as in many others where increase is asked, that they could not give it. In this case they believe that $2,500 is sufficient, and if the gentleman is not satisfied with that salary he can resign and there will be no difficulty in finding some one to take his place.

The question was taken on Mr. Dunnell's amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 23, noes 35.

Mr. DUNNELL. No quorum has voted and I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Dunnell, and Mr. Wells of Missouri were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 2, noes not

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DIBRELL. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of line 1324:

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs may, at his discretion, use a portion of the money appropriated in the Indian appropriation bill of the 15th August, 1876, for the support of schools among the eastern band of Cherokee Indians in aid of schools among said Cherokees residing in Tennessee and Georgia.

The amendment does not propose any new appropriation. It only authorizes the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to use a portion of the sum appropriated last session, for the benefit of the Cherokees, in Tennessee and Georgia.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I would ask the gentleman if these Cherokees are upon the roll of the last census?

Mr. DIBRELL. In reply to the gentleman from North Carolina I desire to say that I do not know that there has been any census taken of the Cherokee Indians of Tennessee and Georgia. I do know, however, that there are in those States a portion of the eastern band of Cherokee Indians, and it seems to me that they ought to have an of Cherokee Indians, and it seems to me that they ought to have an appropriation made for school purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Wells] has an amendment to offer which I think will accomplish the purpose, covering the whole ground, not only of this amendment, but conferring general power upon the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to use the money appropriated for the present year for other purposes than those specifically named in the bill. I suggest to the gentleman from Tenpassee that if after that amendment is reached, it is not satisfactory. nessee that if, after that amendment is reached, it is not satisfactory to him he can then offer his amendment.

Mr. DIBRELL. With that understanding I withdraw my amend-

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I offer the following amendment: For this amount to pay James M. Roane balance for supplies furnished Indian agent in California, as per letter of Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $39.34.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. If we are going to insert these claims

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. If we are going to insert these claims in the bill we might as well abandon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is simply a claim against the Government.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. It is simply a claim, and I trust the gentleman from North Carolina will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I am sorry that I have not been able to hear anything that the gentleman in charge of the bill has

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. How many more such claims have you? Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. This is the last; and I know the gentleman will feel thankful for that statement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that this is not in order on an appropriation bill; that it is a claim against the Government and should go to the Committee of Claims. It is not a matter of appropriation, but a claim simply. Of course such matters do not go before the Committee on Appropriations or belong to an appropriation bill

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. This money has been due to Mr. Roane for more than fourteen years. There is a : nall balance due him of thirty-nine dollars and some odd cents, and the Commissioner on Indian Affairs says that there is no appropriation to pay it. It is a very small matter and I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his point of order and let it be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should withdraw the point of order readily but for this reason: There are a great number of claims of this kind, but this claim should go either to the Committee on Indian Affairs or to the Committee of Claims. We do not appropriate money for these claims in an appropriation bill. This bill is a bill appropriating money to carry on the Indian Department under the existing laws, and the amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I desire to say that I have quite a number of inst such claims and if this claim prevails I shall offer them as amend-just such claims, and if this claim prevails I shall offer them as amendments to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and that the amendment of the gentleman from North Caro-

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the expenses of the commission of citizens serving without compensation, appointed by the President under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, $15,000.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. I would ask any member of the Committee on Appropriations to state what are the duties of this commission. I see they are to serve without pay, and yet there is $15,000 appropriated for expenses. I would ask what are the duties of this commission?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. This commission is authorized, under a

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. This commission is authorized, under a law passed in 1869, and the appropriation is to be used simply to pay the necessary expenses of the commission. They are men who stand high in the community, who serve the Government without compensation, their expenses only being paid, and they visit the various points where the bids are received for supplies and where supplies are furnished, and visit different portions of the Indian Territory.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. It strikes me that this commission has been appointed for the purpose of watching the officers of the Government. I suppose it is claimed that the members of the commission has sion inspect contracts for supplies for the Indians and investigate matters of that character. It seems to me that it is entirely superfluous. There can be no necessity for the expenditure of the public money in this way if the officers of the Government are honest. If we have to appoint a commission to take charge of and watch the officers of the Government, then we had better dispense with the officers. I think the paragraph should be stricken out, that it should no longer be the duty of this Government to appoint a traveling comno longer be the duty of this Government to appoint a traveling commission to go about inspecting contracts and goods and supplies and visiting the Indians in different parts of the country. We make large appropriations for Indian agents and superintendents, and it is their duty to see that the Indians are protected, and not swindled.

The question was taken on the motion to strike out; and upon a division there were—ayes 24, noes 10.

Mr. FOSTER. No quorum has voted, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Wells, of Missouri, and Mr. ThrockMORTON were appointed.

MORTON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there ere—ayes 38, noes 47.

No further count being called for, the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For the support of schools not otherwise provided for, for the support of industrial schools, and for other educational purposes for the Indian tribes, $25,000.

Mr. SEELYE. I now offer the amendment which I suggested a momentago, to come in after the paragraph just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses incurred in the erection of a school-house for the Pottawatomies in the year 1875, the same being a re-appropriation of money made for this purpose and not used in 1874, $2,500.

and not used in 1874, $2,500.

Mr. SEELYE. There can be no objection to this amendment. The money was appropriated in 1874, but the school-house was not built in that year.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order until the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] can be heard.

Mr. SEELYE. The school-house was not built during the year for which the appropriation was made, and at the end of the year the money was covered into the Treasury. The agent at the Pottawatomic agency, not understanding this, and supposing that he could draw upon the appropriation, proceeded to the building of the school-house and it was completed. It was then found that there was no fund to pay for it. This amendment simply provides that the appropriation for this purpose shall be remade. I understand there is no objection on the part of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move to amend by inserting after the amendment just adopted that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $2,915 be retained in the Treasury out of the appropriation made for the benefit of the Kiowa Indians, and that the same be paid to Susannah Marble, formerly Susannah Lee, Miller Francis, and John Abiel Lee, of Shackleford County, Texas, surviving children of Abiel Lee, the same being found by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to be the value of property destroyed by said Kiowa Indians at the time said Indians murdered said Lee, his wife, and one daughter, and carrieed the three children above mentioned into captivity.

Mr. FOSTER. I make the point of order upon that amendment. Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment certainly does not belong to this bill, although it may be entirely appropriate from the Committee of

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I have all the papers here to show that these children were carried into captivity by these Indians and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has recommended that this sum be paid for the property actually destroyed by the Indians when the father and mother were killed and the children carried into captivity. I hope no point of order will be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. It may be entirely proper in some bill, but it certainly does not belong to an appropriation bill.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. There was a similar amendment offered to the Indian appropriation bill at the last session of Congress, and I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I must insist upon the point of order.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.
The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For incidental expenses of the Indian service in the following States and Territories, namely: In Arizona Territory, $20,000; California, $30,000; Colorado, $4,000; Dakota Territory, $10,000: Idaho Territory, $3,000; Montana Territory, $6,000; Washington Territory, $10,000; Wyoming Territory, $1,000; Nevada, $10,000; Territory of New Mexico, $15,000; Oregon, $10,000; Utah Territory, $10,000; Central superintendency, $4,000; in all, $132,000: Provided, That the same shall be used for annuity goods, subsistence, agricultural implements, for educational purposes, for repairs of flour-mills, saw-mills, agency-buildings, incidental transportation, and for paying employés.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out in line 1362 the word "30" and inserting in lieu thereof "20;" so as to make the appropriation for incidental expenses of the Indian service in California $20,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no objection to that.
The question being put, the amendment was declared adopted.
Mr. FOSTER. I call for a division.
Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment is all right.

Mr. LUTTRELL. For the information of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] I will call his attention to pages 15, 16, and 226 of the Report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the year 1875. Now, sir, there is no necessity for appropriating $30,000 for the Indian service in California. I find that on one reservation alone the product last year amounted, as shown by the agent's report, to nearly $25,000. They have 207,360 acres of land, one hundred and eighteen $25,000. They have 207,360 acres of land, one hundred and eighteen work-horses, two mules, and several hundred head of cattle. They cut about six thousand dollars' worth of lumber. They raise four thousand dollars' worth of wheat, two thousand dollars' worth of corn, fifteen hundred dollars' worth of oats and barley, fifteen hundred dollars' worth of vegetables, and seven or eight thousand dollars' worth of hay. Now a large number of the most respectable citizens in my district have offered to take charge of that reservation, to feed and clothe the Indians, to educate them, to furnish teachers, ministers, and physicians, if it be agreed that they shall have in return the use of the grazing-lands on that reservation. The reports show that there are three hundred and fifty-four able-bodied men on the reservation well analified as farmers millers and stock-growers. They can obtain empalified as farmers millers and stock-growers. qualified as farmers, millers, and stock-growers. They can obtain employment anywhere in that locality at from $1 to $1.50 per day and ployment anywhere in that locality at from $1 to $1.50 per day and their board. There is no necessity for our making this large appropriation to take care of these men when they are just as well able to work as you and I. I hope the amendment will prevail, for every dollar appropriated in excess of $20,000 is just as good as stolen from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that this is the only appropriation made for the Indian service in the State of California; and I learn from those who I think are best informed on the question—the officers in charge—that the sum named in the bill is as small an amount.

cers in charge—that the sum named in the bill is as small an amount as they can get along with. I fear that my friend from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] has some personal grievance in this matter which occasions his opposition to the appropriation of $30,000. The Indian Department is strongly of the opinion that $30,000 is needed, and has so convinced our committee. I think that the House had better stand by the committee.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman's intimation that I may have some personal grievance, I believe that in offering this amendment I am simply discharging my duty under my oath. I cannot sit here and see money appropriated where there is no necessity for it. I hold in my hand a letter from a gentleman who stands high in the party to which my friend belongs, and the writer assures me there is no necessity for the appropriation of a dollar for this locality.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to ask the gentleman how many agencies there are in California. I believe he refers to one particular agency.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand there are three agencies.

Mr. LUTTRELL. There are three; one has been abolished during

Mr. FOSTER. Abolished, as I understand, because the department had not the money to maintain it.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The report of the Indian agent states that the Indians left the reservation. They are dissatisfied. They can obtain employment anywhere.

Mr. FOSTER. My information is that there was no money to maintain the agency and for that reason it was abolished.

Mr. LUTTRELL. If the gentleman will read the reports, he will find that this amendment rests on perfectly sufficient grounds. This agency is located near where I reside. I am thoroughly acquainted with the facts of the case; and the gentleman cannot find a republican or democrat of any respectability in that locality who will not tell him that there is no necessity for the appropriation of a dollar.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that my friend from Ohio will not press this to a vote by tellers.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to stand by the Committee on Appropriations, while the chairman [Mr. HOLMAN] wants to go back on the tions, while the chairman [Mr. HOLMAN] wants to go back on the committee

Mr. HOLMAN. On the statement of the gentleman from California the ameudment appears entirely proper.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from California says one thing and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs another. The Committee on Appropriations agrees with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Now if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations wants to go back on the committee, all right.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon the facts submitted it would seem that $20,000 is an ample appropriation.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Foster and Mr. Luttrell were appointed,

Mr. HOLMAN. In order to facilitate business, I suggest that a vote be allowed on this amendment in the House.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That will be satisfactory.
Mr. FOSTER. No, sir; I do not agree to that.
The committee divided; and the tellers reported ages 62, noes not

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the aggregate amount in this paragraph will be changed so as to conform to the amendment just adopted.

There was no objection.

Mr. LYNDE. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. We can finish this bill in less than half an hour. Mr FOSTER. I do not know how long it will take to finish it if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations goes back on the committee all the time.

Mr. HOLMAN. When we are shown that we can reduce an appro-Mr. HOLMAN. When we are shown that we can reduce an priation to the extent of $10,000, of course I must assent to it.

priation to the extent of $10,000, of course I must assent to it.

Several MEMBERS. Let us finish the bill.

The motion of Mr. Lynde was not agreed to.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I want to suggest to the committee an amendment which, from my knowledge of the Indians in question, is, I am certain, correct; and in offering it I think I shall be sustained by the Delegate from the Territory of Idaho, [Mr. Fenn.] I find in lines 1349 to 1354 the following:

For this amount, to be expended by the direction of the President, in assisting the roving bands of Indians in Southeastern Idaho to move and locate on the Fort Hall reservation in Idaho Territory, and to assist them in educational and agricultural pursuits on said reservation, $20,000.

This appropriation has been repeated in these Indian bills for years; yet having occasion to travel through that country four or five times a year, I can testify that I do not know of any particular efforts that have been made to put those Indians on that reservation; so I have no doubt the money is otherwise expended, probably meritoriously. But I move to amend by reducing the appropriation to $15,000, and But I move to amend by reducing the appropriation to $15,000, and adding the $5,000 in line 620, so as to appropriate $20,000 for the benefit of the mixed Shoshones, Bannacks, and Sheepeaters. These Indians are congregated on a reservation in the Lemhi Valley under the charge of a frugal agent, and are making good progress in civilization and the arts. They are building little homes there; they have schools among them; they are peaceful and every way meritorious Indians. Heretofore they have had $20,000 a year for their appropriation. This bill reduces that $5,000, and I am informed that $15,000 a year will be too little for this meritorious band of Indians. As it will make no change in the amount of the bill. I trust the com-As it will make no change in the amount of the bill, I trust the committee will agree to my amendment, and therefore I move the trans. fer be made.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. There is no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Montana, as it is a mere transfer from one part of the bill to another.

Mr. FENN. Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the amendment I wish to say I do not know that I have any special objection to make to it. I reside in the Territory of Idaho, and from information which comes to me it appears these Indians are advancing in the arts of civilization; that they are quiet and peaceful, and that the white people are perfectly satisfied with them.

But I wish to add so for as the expression for the Fort Hall res

But I wish to add, so far as the appropriation for the Fort Hall reservation is concerned, $20,000 would not be a sufficient sum if the law were faithfully carried out. There is no advance in civilization on the part of the Snake, Bannack, and Sheepeater bands of Indians, who ought to go upon that reservation, are wandering vagabonds, while the bands of the same tribes at Fort Lembi reservation are peaceful and quiet, advancing in civilization, and, as I have said, the white people are perfectly satisfied with them. The Indians who ought to be removed and kept upon the Fort Hall reservation are wandering all over the country, notwithstanding from year to year this appropriation is made for the purpose of removing them to that reservation. If this appropriation of $20,000 be made for this purpose it will only be squandered as heretofore, and not at all expended for the removal of these Indians. Therefore I am willing that $5,000, in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Montana, shall be transferred where it will do some good, and be a benefit to the Bannacks, Snakes, and Sheepeaters.

Mr. FORT. I move to strike out the whole paragraph. By the remarks of both gentlemen representing that section of country, it seems clear the entire appropriation should be stricken out. I should seems clear the entire appropriation should be stricken out. I should like to know why the gentleman from Montana did not make that motion instead of proposing to transfer part of this sum to another place? It seems this money has been expended year after year, and yet nothing has been done. The gentleman who has just taken his seat, the Delegate from Idaho, Mr. [FENN,] says if we make the appropriation it will be squandered and no good come of it. For my part, I wish to be economical and not to have any money of the Government equandered. Therefore I would not be her between the motion of the government equandered. part, I wish to be economical and not to have any money of the Government squandered. Therefore I wonder why the whole paragraph has not been stricken out before. I make that motion, and should like to be informed from the committee why this appropriation has been inserted. We have heard, as I have said, from the two gentlemen representing that particular district of country that this appropriation even if made will not be used for the purpose specified.

Mr. McGINNIS, I stated so far as collecting these Indiana manner.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I stated, so far as collecting these Indians upon the Fort Hill reservation is concerned, no progress has been made in the Fort Hill reservation is concerned, no progress has been made in that direction.

Mr. FORT. Then what is this for?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I am informed by the Commissioner this money is expended for subsistence for these Indians.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Why make any transfer of this $5,000 if it is not needed for the purpose specified? Why not strike it out entirely?

Mr. MAGINNIS. It is used for a purpose, as we are informed by the Commissioner, which is meritorious and proper.

Mr. FRANKLIN. The Committee on Appropriations have said by their report the appropriation to which this $5,000 additional is to be transferred is sufficient; and, if that be so, I do not see why we should appropriate any portion of this sum, when it appears from what gen-tlemen representing the country where these Indians are located have tlemen representing the country where these Indians are located have said it has never yet been expended for the purpose specified.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I say that the sum of $15,000 is not enough for Lemhi. They had $20,000 heretofore, and ought to have it now.

Mr. FENN. I will say now, as I have said before, that the appropriation of $20,000 to remove the fugitive, wandering Indians about Boisé City and Fort Boisé, wandering over one-third of the Territory of Idaho, is not sufficient. The Fort Lemhi reservation has been properly conducted, and the Indians congregated there have remained there. They are advancing in the arts of civilization. I believe the agent at Fort Hall reservation is responsible for the neglect in reference to that reservation. I know the Weiser and other Indians are wandering over a large part of Idaho, and not only have not been removed but no effort has been made to remove them to this reservation. I was at Fort Hall reservation last fall. I saw there had been some improvement made there. On making inquiry I learned that about one-fourth of the number of the Indians who ought to be upon that reservation continuously only made it their headquarters; while that reservation continuously only made it their headquarters; while that reservation continuously only made it their headquarters; while three-fourths of those who should be there, and for whose removal these appropriations have been made from year to year, never have been there. I am willing this change should be made, and $5,000 of the amount proposed should be transferred and added to the appropriation for the Fort Lemhi reservation, where it is likely to do good. It will be taken from where under the maladministration of the agent at Fort Hell we good has been or will be done.

at Fort Hall no good has been or will be done.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I am informed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs this appropriation is needed for these Indians to feed and clothe them.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his motion to strike out?

Mr. FORT. I do not if the gentleman having this bill in charge states that this money is needed for another purpose. If that be so, I hope he will state it. The bill specifies it is for the purpose of colonizing these Indians, and yet both gentlemen representing that section of country have asserted it is not needed, as heretofore it has never been used for that purpose.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The transfer proposed by the gentleman from Montana is only carrying out what was the original intention of the amendment.

Mr. FORT. I withdraw my objection. Mr. Maginnis's amendment was agreed to. Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I offer the following amendment:

Add at the end of section 3 the following:
And all sums appropriated by this act for pay of employés under treaty stipulations, or otherwise, may if necessary be used in paying employés other than those specifically named herein.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I desire to go back to section 2. I move to amend that section by adding the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no purchase of supplies exceeding in the aggregate $500 in value at any one time shall be made without advertisement except in cases of exigency, when purchases may be made in open market in amount not exceeding $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I offer an amendment to section 3 which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 3, after the amendment already adopted, the following: Provided, That no sum of money appropriated by this bill for the support of any Indian tribe shall be paid to any tribe while said tribe, or any band thereof, are engaged in hostilities against the white people.

Mr. LUTTRELL. An amendment was offered last year while the Indian appropriation bill was under consideration similar to the one I now offer. It was adopted then, I believe, unanimously by the House. At all events no objection was made to it. I hope the amendment, if satisfactory to the gentleman who has charge of the bill, will

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I think the amendment is not necessary. The result would be that as long as Sitting Bull was at war with the Government so long the Indians of his tribe, whether hostile or not, would not receive one dollar in the way of supplies. It would prove would not receive one dollar in the way of supplies. It would prove a great hardship to many peaceful Indians.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The amendment might be modified so as to provide that no hostile Indians shall draw any supplies.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. We have just provided in this bill that the Indians themselves must come to the agencies to get their supplies. They are to be given out, not to the heads of tribes or bands, but to the heads of families, and for not more than one week in advance.

Mr. LUTTRELL. If the gentleman from Missouri thinks that that will cover the case I will not press the amendment. My only desire is to provide that the whites shall be protected. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the fourth and last section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That whenever, in the judgment of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the funds herein or hereafter appropriated for any tribes or bands of Indians can be more advantageously used for any other tribe or band of Indians, he is hereby authorized to so use such funds: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed to extend to appropriations made in fulfillment of treaty provisions, and that the permission herein given is extended to the unexpended balances of appropriations made by the act of March 3, 1875, and August 15, 1876.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

SEC. 5. That so much of the appropriation herein made as may be required to pay for goods and supplies, and for transportation and distribution of the same to Indians on reservations which are necessarily supplied by way of the Missouri River, for the year ending June 30, 1878, shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIBRELL. I now ask a vote on my amendment to come in at line 1324, as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman.] The amendments of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Wells] do not touch the case. I ask the Clerk to read my amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 1324 add the following:
The Commissioner of Indian Affairs may at his discretion use a portion of the money appropriated in the Indian appropriation bill of August 15, 1876, for the support of schools among the eastern band of Cherokee Indians, in aid of schools among such Cherokees residing in Tennessee and Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCHER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4452) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote desired upon any of the amendments?

Mr. WILSHIRE. I ask that the amendments may be read. The amendments were read and were severally concurred in.
Mr. MILLS. With the consent of the committee, I offer an amendent. I think there will be no objection to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 1040 add the following:
And the President of the United States is hereby directed to prohibit the removal of any portion of said Sioux Indians to the Indian Territory, unless the same shall be hereafter anthorized by act of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSHIRE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At line 732 insert the following:

That the proper accounting and executive officers of the United States are hereby authorized and directed to carry into effect the resolution passed and approved on the 26th day of June, 1873, by the national council of the Osage Indians and approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the 8th day of July, 1874, for the payment out of the proceeds of the sales of the Osage lands in Kansas, now in the custody of the United States, of so much as remains unpaid of the debt of said Indians as fixed and acknowledged by said resolution.

Mr. FORT. I desire to have read the resolution referred to in the amendment and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was ac-

The bill was passed.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECUSANT WITNESSES-LOUISIANA RETURNING BOARD.

Mr. LYNDE. I rise to a question of privilege. I am informed that the four witnesses constituting the returning board of the State of Louisiana, who were ordered to be brought to the bar of the House for contempt and breach of the privileges of the House, are now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms and ready to be presented at the bar of the House, and I ask that they be presented at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will bring to the bar of the House the witnesses.

After a pause-

JAMES B. EADS.

Mr. HOLMAN. While preparations are being made for the business to which the gentleman from Wisconsin has referred, I ask permission to report from the Committee on Appropriations a bill to provide for the payment of James B. Eads for the construction of jetties and other auxiliary works to make a wide and deep channel between the South Pass of the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico, under contract with the United States. The bill (H. R. No. 4540) was received and read a first and second time. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $500,000 to James B. Eads, of Saint Louis, or his assigns or legal representatives, the Secretary of War having determined that that amount is due to said Eads by the terms of a certain written contract entered into by said Eads with the United States to construct such permanent and sufficient jetties and such auxiliary works as may be necessary to create a wide and deep channel between the South Pass of the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico, to be paid under and in pursuance of the provisions of the act approved mission to report from the Committee on Appropriations a bill to propaid under and in pursuance of the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1875, making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of public works on rivers and harbors, and for other

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WILSHIRE. I object.
Mr. HOLMAN. The bill under the rule would have to go into Committee of the Whole, but if I had a moment I could avoid the necessity of going into committee. I wish to state to the Chair, if the Chair pleases, that unless this bill is passed at once, it is probable that Mr. Eads will be entitled to receive 5 per cent. bonds instead of the money, and it is important therefore that it should be acted on at

I do not wish the House to act upon this matter without a perfect understanding of the subject in all its bearings, for it involves a large sum of money, but I ask unanimous consent that the bill be con-understanding of the subject in all its bearings, for it involves a large sum of money, but I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule, at this time.

Mr. LYNDE. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order, then, will carry the bill into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I now move, as it is a matter of high public importance that the bill shall pass to-day, that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the first bill on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The House can get over that by laying aside all the preceding bills.

Mr. LYNDE. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection being withdrawn the bill is before the House, and by consent it will be considered as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union under the five-minute ule.

Whole on the state of the Union under the five-minute ule.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to offer an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. LYNDE. I am informed that the Sergeant-at-Arms is ready to produce at the bar of the House the witnesses who were ordered to be brought here for a violation of the privileges of this House. I ask that that business may now be proceeded with.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose this other business will occupy but a few minutes

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to say.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that the consideration of this bill will be resumed when the other business has been disposed of, I will have no objection.

The SPEAKER. It will of course come up as unfinished business.

RECUSANT WITNESSES-RETURNING BOARD OF LOUISIANA.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS then appeared at the bar of the House, and said:

Mr. Speaker, in obedience to the order of the House, I have now at its bar the witnesses, J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson, G. Casanave, and Louis M. Kenner.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] whether he desires the usual question to be wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] whether he desires the usual question to be put to these witnesses separately?

Mr. LYNDE. I would suggest that they be questioned separately. The SPEAKER. Mr. Wells, it is the duty of the Chair to again ask you what excuse you have to offer for your failure to appear before a committee of this House, sitting in the city of New Orleans, Louisiana, on the 12th day of December, 1876, and to produce before the said committee certain books and papers called for in the subpæna duces tecum duly served upon you.

Mr. Wells, (the witness.) Mr. Speaker, the remaining members of Mr. Wells, (the witness.) Mr. Speaker, the remaining members of the board having just arrived in this city, we have had no opportunity to confer together upon the subject and to frame our answer. We would therefore ask the indulgence of the House to give us an opportunity for conference, and that we may make our answer to the House on Monday or Tuesday, or any other day of next week that the Honse may see proper to indicate.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Anderson, it is the duty of the Chair to again ask you what excuse you have to offer for your failure to appear before a committee of this House, sitting in the city of New Orleans, Lonisiana, on the 12th day of December, 1876, and to produce before

Mr. Anderson, (the witness.) Mr. Speaker, when we were before you the first time we asked to be allowed further time, that is until Mr. Kenner and Mr. Casanave should arrive from New Orleans. They arrived on yesterday, but we have had no opportunity to confer with them, and met them only about twelve o'clock to-day. We now ask the House to grant us until Monday or Tuesday next at one o'clock to make our answer.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Casanave, it is the duty of the Chair to ask you what excuse you have to offer for your failure to appear before a committee of this House, sitting in the city of New Orleans, Louisiana, on the 12th day of December, 1876, and to produce before the said committee certain books and papers called for in the subpæna duces

Mr. CASANAVE, (the witness.) My answer, Mr. Speaker, will be the same as that given by Mr. Anderson and Mr. Wells.

Mr. Kenner, (the witness.) Having just arrived in this city, and having been unable to see the president of the board and General Anderson until about noon to-day, I have to ask the indulgence of the House until we shall have had time to consult.

Mr. LYNDE. I offer the resolutions which I send up to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson, G. Casanave, and Lewis M. Kenner be, and are hereby, adjudged to be in contempt for a violation of the privileges of this House.

Resolved, That J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson, G. Casanave, and Lewis M. Kenner be, and are hereby, ordered to appear before the special committee appointed to investigate the recent election in Louisiana, of which Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON is chairman, and produce all consolidated returns of supervisors of election, all statements of votes and tally-sheets for each polling-place in the late election for electors of President and Vice-President, together with all affidavits, depositions, protests, and other written proofs in their possession or under their control on the 11th day of December, 1876, touching the said election in the parishes of East Baton Rouge, West Baton Rouge, Bossier, Calcasieu, Caldwell, Carroll, Catahoula, Claiborne, Concordia, De Soto, East Feliciana, West Feliciana, Franklin, Grant, Iberia, Jefferson, (right and left banks,) La Fayette, La Fourche, Lincoln, Livingstone, Madison, Morehouse, Ouachita, Plaquemines, Red River, Richland, Sabine, Saint Charles, Saint Martin, Tangipahoa, Vermillion, Vernon, Washington, Webster, and Winn, and that said witnesses be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms and be by him closely kept until the further order of this House.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin I Mr. Lyndel

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] propose to ask the previous question on the first resolution?

Mr. LYNDE. I ask the previous question on both resolutions.

Mr. KASSON. The first resolution, adjudging these witnesses in contempt, I submit to the gentleman, ought to be open to consideration and discussion.

Mr. LYNDE. Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, I wish to state that this subpœna was served upon these witnesses six weeks ago, about the 12th of December; that Mr. Wells and Mr. Anderson were arraigned at the bar of this House more than a week ago, when they asked to be allowed to delay the presentation of their answer until the other witnesses should be produced at the bar. I think they have had ample time to prepare any answer they might choose to present

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?
Mr. LYNDE. Certainly.
Mr. HOAR. I ask the gentleman whether it is true that the other member of the returning board not now present has been locked up in close custody since his arrival in the city and that no opportunity has been furnished for his associates to confer with him, although the House adjourned the hearing that such conference might be had!

Mr. LYNDE. I know of no member of the returning board who is not present at this time.

Mr. HOAR. Are they all present?

Mr. LYNDE. They are. [Laughter.] If we are to get at these papers, we have no time to lose; and I therefore insist that the previous question be called and that the resolutions be acted upon at once.

Mr. KASSON, Mr. HOAR, and others addressed the Chair. [Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to keep order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that the recently arrived members of the board have not been allowed to consult with their associates according to the understanding of the House; that they have been kept under duress and separate, without authority of law.

Mr. COX. We have no chance to answer that statement.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to offer an amendment which I think the gentleman from Wisconsin would be willing to accept after he hears it. I desire to make the commitment in this case correspond with what the gentleman will recollect was the commitment in the Erwin case. I desire to insert these words: "And while so in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms they shall be confined in the common jail of the District of Columbia."

Mr. LYNDE. I do not accept that amendment.

Mr. PAGE. Had we not better take them out and hang them right

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask my friend from Wisconsin whether the two members of the returning board first produced at the bar of the House have had the opportunity of conference with their associates, the House having postponed their case to enable them to have such conference

Mr. LYNDE. I understand that they have been together since half past eleven o'clock this morning.

Mr. KASSON. O, that is no time.

Mr. Anderson (one of the witnesses) rose and proceeded to make a statement

The SPEAKER. The witness will be seated. He has not the right to speak without the consent of the House.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the witness have the right to speak through somebody else

Mr. CLYMER. I rise to a question of order, which is that the genthe adoption of the resolutions, debate is out of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that there can be no vote on the previous question unless a hearing be allowed.

Mr. CLYMER. You have been heard quite enough. We propose

The SPEAKER. The Chair was desirous that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] should have an opportunity to ask a question, and understood that the gentleman from Wisconsin was willing to hear the question. The latter gentleman now demands the previous question upon the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. KASSON. Unless the gentleman will allow us an opportunity to exchange conversation for the purpose of eliciting information, I move that the House now adjourn. I think that the first resolution is vitally defective in one particular.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn

Mr. GARFIELD. The House has not heard the answer of these

Mr. GARTIELD. The House has not heard the answer of these witnesses. Their answers are in their hands and not heard.
Mr. LYNDE. I ask whether the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] can get the floor for the purpose of making his motion?
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he can.
Mr. COX. This is an attempt to defeat the will of the people and the will of the State of Louisiana.
Mr. PAGE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be upon the motion just made by the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and that is whether I may be permitted to ask what gentlemen on the other side

Mr. HOAR. If I can be permitted to answer, as I understand—Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order, that the motion to adjourn is not debatable. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. Neither the motion to fix a day to which the House will adjourn nor the motion to adjourn is debatable.

Mr. HOAR. I shall be very glad to answer my friend's question.
Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection to that.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts answering a question propounded by the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object for the reason that the gentleman from Wisconsin has charge of this matter-

Several Members. No debate!

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. Page] that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next; on which the yeas and nays have

So the House refused to adjourn over.

During the roll-call, Mr. HANCOCK moved to dispense with the reading of the names. Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, objected.

The vote was then announced, as above recorded.

The question next recurred on Mr. Kasson's motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. HANCOCK. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to withdraw his motion to adjourn.

Mr. KASSON. I will withdraw it for the purpose of hearing what the gentleman from Texas has to say.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Iowa withdraws his motion to adjourn then the question recurs on the demand of the gen-tleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] for the previous question, and that cuts off all debate.

Mr. RUSK. Let us have the regular order.
Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman from Wisconsin does not object I will withdraw the motion to adjourn for the purpose of hearing what the gentleman from Texas desires to propose.

Mr. HANCOCK. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and then, that being done, I propose to move the witnesses have one hour within which to prepare their answer.

Mr. LYNDE. I am willing to consent that further action on these resolutions shall be postponed for one hour, to give these witnesses time to prepare and present their answer to the House.

Mr. KASSON. That will be satisfactory to me, without waiving any right to ask for brief debate on the case as then presented.

Mr. LYNDE. I will modify my motion of postponement, and say half on hour. half an hour

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand the witnesses say half an hour is sufficient. I agree to that. Let it go at half an hour.

The subject was then postponed for half an hour.

JAMES B. EADS.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4540) to provide for the payment of James B. Eads for the construction of jetties, and other auxiliary works to make wide and deep the channel between the South Pass of the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico, under contract with the United States, re-ported from the Committee on Appropriations by the gentleman from

Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. BUCKNER. I move the following substitute, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting what I send up to the Clerk's

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to deliver to said James B. Eads, or his assigns or legal representatives, the sum of $500,000 in bonds of the United States, as provided for by an act entitled an "Act making provision for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875; the Secretary of War having determined that said sum is due to said Eads by the terms of a certain written contract entered into by said Eads with the United States under and by the provisions of said act of March 3, 1875.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, the object of this amendment is to comply with the express terms of the contract with Captain Eads to clean out the mouth of the Mississippi River. I propose to read that section and show that the Secretary of the Treasury has put an improper construction upon this act, necessarily imposing the necessity upon Captain Eads to come before Congress whenever he complies with the terms of his contract and beg for an appropriation. I undertake to say that that is not the fair construction of the law. It is perfectly apparent I am right about it.
Section —— provides—

Sec. — That the option of discharging the obligations herein assumed by the United States, either in money or bonds, is expressly reserved; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to issue the bonds of the United States, bearing 5 per cent, interest, of the character and description set out in the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the public debt," approved July 14, 1870, to said Eads or his legal representatives, in payment at par of the aforesaid warrants of the Secretary of War, unless the Congress of the United States shall have previously provided for the payment of the same by the necessary appropriations of money.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. There is so much confusion in the Hall that I did not distinctly hear what the gentleman from Missouri Hall that I did not distinctly hear what the gentleman from Missouri read. I ask him to read that section again.

Mr. BUCKNER, (having again read the section.) Now, Congress has made no appropriation, and this is an attempt to appropriate money after the Secretary of War has decided that Eads is entitled to this $500,000, and, as I think, under the terms of the law to $500,000 in bonds, if he prefers it. This bill is the first appropriation that Congress has made. The Secretary of War has decided that Eads is entitled to the $500,000 and has given him a warrant to that effect, and the Secretary of the Treasury decides he will pay only in money and will not pay till an appropriation is made. That, I understand, is the only point in dispute.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Does not the law as it exists direct the

Mr. Fillitre, of all states and the manner of this payment?

Mr. BUCKNER. I think beyond all question it does. If these bonds were less than par Eads would have to take them. But they happen to be a little in advance of par, and therefore the Secretary of the Treasury refuses to pay in that way.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. HURLBUT. I wish to call the attention of the House to the object and purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, which I heartily support. Under the act approved March 3, 1875, the work of opening the South Pass was given to James B. Eads and his associates on certain terms. It was expressly provided that the Secretary of War should be the agent, not of Eads, but of the United States, to determine whether or not he had complied with his contract as to depth of water and width of channel. The law imperatively demands that when the certificate of the Secretary of War is made out and his requisition made, the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue a certain prescribed character of bonds of the United States, unless the Congress of the United States shall have previously provided for the payment of the same by the necessary appropriation of money.

At the commencement of this session the Secretary of War, in an official communication, notified this House that this sum of money would be needed during the session of Congress, on or before the 1st of February. The House made no provision. The requisite depth of water was obtained. The certificate of the engineer to that effect was filed with the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War referred certain questions to the Attorney-General and received a favorable report, and then filed his requisition upon the Treasury to pay this amount. Now, sir, it is simply a breach of the public faith, after the rights of Mr. Eads and his associates have accrued by the performance of the work in strict accordance with the terms of the contract by the determination of his entitlement to this money by the Secretary of War, to say that the money shall be paid otherwise than as the law provides. The status of the parties is fixed by the law, upon that certificate of the Secretary of War, and the right of Mr. Eads in any court of justice is unquestionable and could not be hesitated over at all. But the Secretary of the Treasury has thought proper not to carry out that strict letter of the law, but to submit to the House, through the Committee on Appropriations, a proposition that the House now, after the fact, after the rights of the parties are settled, after Mr. Eads's right to the bonds is beyond any question in any court, to force him to accept now, to his own loss, the money appropriation sought to be made by this bill.

I do not know, sir, that I could make this matter any clearer if I were to talk about it for any length of time the House might permit. There is no lawyer in this House who will not say that if a mandamus were sued out by Mr. Eads in any court having jurisdiction, the Secretary of the Treasury would be ordered to issue these bonds. Now, sir, the effect of the action brought here to-day is simply this; and the action of the House in adopting this amendment simply affirms the construction which the House puts upon the rights of these par-ties, and is a notice to the Secretary of the Treasury which he is bound

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the question presented here is of such moment that I am exceedingly anxious that the House shall understand well all the questions involved before either appropriating this stand well all the questions involved before either appropriating this money or providing, if the House shall so determine, that the bonds shall issue, and the public debt be increased by the payment in bonds.

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read papers received from the War Department and from the Treasury Department, documents which will make this matter, I think, very clear. It involves the payment either in money or in bonds of the amount due to Mr. Eads, making a difference, according to the way in which we pay it, as the Secretary of the Treasury says, of $60,000. These 5 per cent. gold-bearing bonds are said to be at 12 per cent. premium, and the difference between paying in these bonds or in the lawful money of the United States as the contract provided would be $60,000.

Mr. HURLBUT. How can you make that difference unless the Government would otherwise sell those bonds?

Mr. HOLMAN. The Government can sell those bonds at 12 per cent. premium. I ask that the communication which I send to the Clerk's desk, from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House, may be read. It bears date the 24th day of the present month. The Clerk read as follows:

January 24, 1877.

SIR: Referring to my interview of this morning with a subcommittee of your committee, and to their verbal request, I have the honor to say that the Secretary of War, on the 20th instant, made requisition on this Department for $500,000, in payment of that amount claimed to be due and payable to Mr. Eads under the act of March 3, 1875.

of War, on the 20th instant, toach of March 3, 1875.

Mr. Eads, on the 22d instant, applied at this Department for payment, supposing himself to be entitled to that amount on the requisition of the Secretary of War, or on failure thereof, to an issue of United States bonds to that amount, in the contingency provided for by the above act.

The Secretary of War had, in his annual report in December last, advised Congress that $500,000 would probably be required on or about the 1st of February next to make the first payment to Mr. Eads should the Attorney-General be of his opinion as to a proposition involved in the prosecution of the work, which he had submitted to this Department. On the 22d instant the Secretary of War made a further special communication to Congress, to the effect that Eads was by him considered entitled to the payment, and asking an appropriation of the amount above stated. As no appropriation had been made by Congress for this specific purpose, the requisition of the Secretary of War could not be complied with by this Department.

the requisition of the Secretary of War could not be complied with by this Department.

It is apparent, upon a fair construction of the act, that payments are to be made upon the requisition of the Secretary of War upon the Secretary of the Treasury, (and not according to its terms "on his warrant on the Treasure,") either in money or United States bonds, but the Secretary of War can only make this requisition after he has become satisfied that the conditions of the contract have been complied with, and, as Congress is to be advised by him of the probable time when payments will become due, doubtless to the end that proper appropriations may be made, and as, in this instance, the information of the necessity for the appropriation at this time is so recent, it may not be questioned that Congress may properly exercise the option to make the payment in money, contemplated in the act. It is submitted that to issue the bonds provided for in the act would be unwise, as it would, without actual public necessity of lack of public revenue, increase the public debt, and in this instance operate a direct loss as a financial operation to the Government of some $60,000, these bonds being at this date at a premium of 123 per cent.

To prevent unnecessary delay and inconvenience to parties in future, it is suggested that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to make payments out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as they shall fall due and become payable under the terms of the act, upon the requisition of the Secretary of War. This method, while it would relieve the Secretary from the necessity of an issue of bonds, would not change the terms and limitations upon which payments can alone be made.

Very respectfully,

LOT M. MORRILL,

Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

P. S.—In accordance with the suggestion of the subcommittee, I herewith submit draught of an act for the purpose above stated, and commend it to your especial attention, as it has of necessity been somewhat hastily prepared.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit now the letter of the Secretary of War, and upon which the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is based:

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit now the letter of the Secretary of War, and upon which the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is based:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

Washington City, January 19, 1877.

SIB: I have the honor to report for the information of Congress that under the provisions of paragraphs 2 and 10 of the fourth section of the river and harbor act, of March 3, 1875. I have made requisition upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a settlement of $500,000 in favor of James B. Eads, and to transmit herewith the documents on which this action is based.

In my annual report, dated November 20, 1876, I stated as follows:

"As required by the act of March 3, 1875. The progress on the works for the improvement of the South Pass of the Mississippi River, under James B. Eads and his associates, has been inspected and reported upon from time to time by Major C. B. Comstock, the officer detailed for that purpose under the provisions of the law, and his report has been published by Congress. His last report, showing the condition of the works on the 17th of August, is transmitted herewith. It shows that the maximum draught of water which could be taken through the channel between the jetties on that date was 19.8 feet; but that there was a shoal at the head of the pass through which only 13½ feet could be taken. Another survey is in progress at the present time, and Major Comstock telegraphs, under date of November 18, that a draught of 20.3 feet can now be carried through between the jetties, but that for over 2,000 feet of its length this channel is not 200 feet in width, as required by law; and that at the head of the pass there is a channel from 30 to 90 feet wide, through which 18½ feet can be taken.

"The full report of this survey will be presented to Congress as soon as received. (Subsequently published in House of Representatives Ex. Doc. No. 12, Forty-fourth Congress, second session.)

"The question has been raised whether, under the provisions of the law, the first payment should be made after obtaining a depth of tw in accordance with the law. Should this view be sustained by the Attorney-General, it is my duty to notify Congress that $500,000 will probably be required to make first payment to Eads and his associates on or before February, 1877, and the sum of $1.000,000 may possibly be required for further payments during the next sum of $1,000,000 may possibly be required for further payments during the next fiscal year."

The opinion of the Attorney-General, which is transmitted herewith, sustains the views of the commission of engineers above referred to in these words: "Accordingly, the answer I make to your question is that the first installment of $500,000 can be made when the channel at the mouth of the pass is twenty feet deep and two hundred feet wide, although the same depth be not obtained through the shoal at the head of the pass, if no forfeiture shall have arisen by action of Congress or without action of Congress, as provided in the condition mentioned."

The forfeitures referred to have not arisen.

The accompanying map and report by Major C. B. Comstock, the officer of engineers detailed under the act to make inspections, &c., show the condition of the channel of the mouth of the pass, as determined by the most recent survey, and contain the certificate that on December 27, 1876, James B. Eads and his associates had obtained a channel twenty feet in depth and not less than two hundred feet in width.

The conditions of the law seem therefore to have been entirely complied with, and I have made requisition for the first payment, as previously stated.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON.

J. D. CAMERON Secretary of

Hon. SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLYMER obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. Hol-

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask to have read to the House a communica-tion from the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 24th day of the present month, the question having arisen as to the right of the Govmenteither to pay in lawful money or in 5 per cent. gold-bearing bonds.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 22, 1877.

SIR: I would respectfully invite the attention of Congress to the terms of section—of the act approved March 3, 1875, (18 Statutes, part 3,) under which the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue bonds of the United States, bearing 5 per cent. interest, to James B. Eads, of Saint Louis, Missouri, or his legal representatives, in payment at par of the "warrants" of the Secretary of War, unless the Congress of the United States shall have previously provided for the payment of the same by the necessary appropriation of money in favor of said Eads, on account of the construction of jetties, &c., to maintain the channel between the South Pass of the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico, and to the fact that I am now in receipt of a requisition from the honorable Secretary of War calling for the payment of $500,000 to said Eads.

Congress having reserved the option of discharging the obligations assumed by the United States in this matter either in money or bonds, I have to recommend that an appropriation of $500,000 be at once made to enable the Government to make payment to Mr. Eads, it not being wise, in my judgment, to increase the interest-bearing debt of the United States for the purpose of paying obligations of such a purpose.

Very respectfully,

LOT M. MORRILL, Secretary.

Hon. Samuel J. Randall, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BLOUNT obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. Hol-

Mr. HOLMAN. But, Mr. Speaker, there are some facts to which I desire to call the attention of the House. The first is, the Secretary of War in his last annual report informed Congress that probably an appropriation of money would be required for the purpose of paying this $500,000 which the Government had a right to pay in lieu of issuing bonds to that amount. On the 19th day of the present month issuing bonds to that amount. On the 19th day of the present month he informed the House of Representatives that by the terms of contract with Mr. Eads he is now entitled to receive (I quote the substance of his statement) $500,000 in money or bonds, as contemplated by the act by which this improvement is being made.

On the 22d of January the Secretary of the Treasury called the attention of the House to the fact of the propriety of that appropriation. And on the 24th day of the present month he sent to the House the letter last read, in which he calls the attention of Congress to the fact that there is money in the Treasury which may be used to pay fact that there is money in the Treasury which may be used to pay this amount; that it is not wise to increase the interest-bearing debt; that it is not necessary in this instance that, in his judgment, justice will be done by paying Captain Eads in money instead of issuing bonds. It is a financial transaction and paying in bonds would involve the Government in a loss of $60,000.

Now let me state one other fact and then I shall have stated all I desire to say. I shall ask the Clerk to read that portion of the letter of the Secretary of War written on the 19th of the present month which shows the basis upon which the Secretary of the Treasury has sent to the House the communication from the Treasury Department sent to the House the communication from the Treasury Department which has already been read; for I wish to say that it is not simply a question of payment, either in bonds or in money, that the House will consider, but the House ought to consider as squarely before it at this time whether or not Captain Eads has so far complied with the terms of his contract as to be entitled to the payment.

Mr. BUCKNER. There can be no question about that.

Mr. BUCKNER. There can be no question about that.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee on Appropriations, for themselves, so far as they have been able to investigate the matter, have been compelled to rely upon the opinions expressed by the engineers of the Army, of the Secretary of War, and of the Attorney-General, as to the meaning of the contract. The House has now before it the data upon which the Committee on Appropriations have acted, and the propriety of appropriating this money is a matter for the House to consider. The Committee on Appropriations, in conformity to the views of the Secretary of the Treasury, recommend an appropriation of money to be made, if it appears to the Secretary of War that the contract has been so far complied with by Captain Eads as to entitle him to the first payment under the contract.

Mr. ATKINS. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr.

BLOUNT.]
Mr. CAULFIELD. If the gentleman from Georgia will yield, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Hol-

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman can ask the question some other time; I have but five minutes.

time; I have but five minutes.

This matter, it seems to me, is very clear, so far as the duty of this House in the premises is concerned. By the last provision of the bill authorizing this work, the right is expressly reserved to the Government topay Captain Eads either in bonds or in money. My friend from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] complains that if these bonds were now below par Captain Eads would be obliged to take them. That is the law itself, that the Government shall elect which it will pay to him, bonds or money: therefore he has no right to complain.

bonds or money; therefore he has no right to complain.

Mr. FOSTER. When is the Government to make the election?

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will not interrupt me, I will get to that in good time. There are certain facts which, if this Committee of the Whole will comprehend them, will show that not the slightest injustice is done to Captain Eads in the course proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, nothing but justice to all parties concerned. So far as information came to the War Department from the engineers in charge, there was no probability of the work being completed in time to make any call upon the Government for any payment prior to the meeting of Congress. In his report in November, the Secretary of War, acting upon information from the engineers, informed Congress that, probably by the 1st day of February, there would be needed an appropriation of $500,000 to make the first payment to Captain Eads.

The question arose as to the construction of the contract involving improvements higher up the river than those for which claim is now set up for payment. A commission of engineers was directed to inquire, and the Secretary of War representing the Government certainly had the right and was bound in duty to inquire, in reference to that question. The commission of engineers made a report more favorable to Captain Eads than he had expected. Opinions were given by the Attorney-General, and in a report made January 9, 1877, Major C. B. Comstock, of the engineers, reports that by reason of that construction Captain Eads was enabled to withdraw some of his force from the work higher up and to take it to the point where he made the improvements for which he is now seeking payment. The very circumstances precipitated the work, and by reason of this fact the work was completed at an earlier period than was anticipated by Captain Eads, by the War Department, or by anybody else. There was no one here pressing for payment.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Not now; I have not time.

[Here the hammer fell.] The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I am astonished that there should be any difference of opinion upon this question. Here is a plain contract, under which the Government of the United States owes Mr. Eads $500,000, payable either in bonds or money at the option of the Government, for work done by him, and the Secretary of the Treasury informs us that he has the money in the Treasury to pay for it. If we had not the money we would be compelled to issue bonds, which is not payment but an equivalent for delaying payment. For gentlemen now to insist that bonds bearing interest should be given to him when we have the money to pay with, is a strange business proposition. I must say that I never arranged debts in that way, and while I am a Representative of the people upon this floor I propose to attend to their business in the same way that I attend to my own. If I owe a debt and have money lying in bank, I certainly would not give my note bearing interest in lieu of payment. We are informed that the Government has money ready to pay Mr. Eads, and yet gentlemen here propose to increase the interest-bearing debt of the Govtlemen here propose to increase the interest-bearing debt of the Government, with money lying idle in the Treasury. It is said that if the bonds were below par Mr. Eads would have to take the bonds. If the policy advocated, of issuing more bonds, bearing interest, with money lying idle in the Treasury, is adopted, we may expect to see our bonds before long below par. Even if the bonds of the Government were below par, I hold that it would be equally bad policy to issue bonds to him when we have the money with which to pay him. Certainly there can be no force in the argument that we should issue these bonds; for we would save the interest to the Government, whether the bonds were above or below par, by making payment, as

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a ques-

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Certainly.
Mr. BUCKNER. Suppose that Mr. Eads, immediately after the adjournment of Congress, should be entitled to $500,000 and the Secretary of War should so certify. Mr. Eads comes here for his money and it is found that no appropriation has been made to pay him; under the contract would not the Government be obliged to issue bonds to him?

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Congress has notice now for the first time that this amount is due to Captain Eads, and if we make the appropriation the first opportunity we have had to make it, certainly no objection can be made on the part of Mr. Eads. I want Mr. Eads paid according to the contract, but I do not want the interest-bearing debt of this Government increased as long as we have money in the Treasury to meet such claims. It would be much better for the countries of the contract of t try if gentlemen would show more anxiety to pay off our debt and less anxiety to increase it. I hope to see the day when this mania for adding to the bonded indebtedness of the country whenever an opportunity offers will end.

Mr. CAULFIELD. There is no difference between a contract entered into by the Government with an individual and a contract entered into by two individuals. If a contract had been made between two individuals, and it had provided, as this contract provides, tween two individuals, and it had provided, as this contract provides, that upon the completion of a certain portion of this work Mr. Eads should be entitled to $500,000 in bonds, (that is the provision of this contract,) unless money has been previously appropriated for the purpose, what construction should be placed upon the contract? To what bond does this word "previously" apply? It applies to the time of the completion of that portion of the contract which entitles him to the money. That contract was completed upon a certain day of this month; and it was the duty of this Government, if it intended to make use of the ontion which the law gave it either to pay in bonds.

make use of the option which the law gave it either to pay in bonds or pay in money, to have the money ready when Mr. Eads applied for it. Mr. Eads has applied for his money. The gentlemen on the other side of this question admit that he is entitled to it.

Now, to what time does the word "previously" apply? To the time when he is entitled to the money. That was the time when he had completed the contract; and the law says—

That the option of discharging the obligations herein assumed by the United States, either in money or bonds, is expressly reserved; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to issue the bonds of the United States, bearing 5 per cent. interest, of the character and description set out in the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the public debt," approved July 14, 1870, to said Eads or his legal representatives, in payment at par of the aforesaid warrants of the Secretary of War, unless the Congress of the United States shall have previously provided for the payment of the same by the necessary appropriations of money. money

Has Congress "previously" provided for the payment of the sum by the necessary appropriation of money? Not at all; for this committee is now before the House asking for an appropriation. Mr. Eads is therefore entitled to his bonds because Congress has not "previously" appropriated the money. The committee are now here proposing to make the appropriation.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Landers] says that if he has money in bank he has the right to pay that money upon the completion of the contract. Yes, the Government has the money in bank; but it cannot pay it unless Congress has "previously" complied with but it cannot pay it unless Congress has "previously" complied with the law in appropriating it.

Mr. Eads being entitled to the bonds at the time when this work was so far completed as to secure twenty feet depth of water, it is unjust to him for us now to make him take the money, simply because he will make a little more by receiving the bonds. This is no way to encourage a great work like this. One of the greatest works this world has ever seen is about to be completed at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

RECUSANT WITNESSES-LOUISIANA RETURNING BOARD.

The SPEAKER. The witnesses are again at the bar, in pursuance of the postponement made by the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will not require more than fifteen minutes to finish this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows nothing about how long it may require for that purpose. The House postponed the hearing of the cases of these witnesses thirty minutes, and the witnesses are now at the bar to answer.

Mr. LYNDE. I am informed that the witnesses have an answer which they wish to present to the House. If that is the case I will ask that the answer may be read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Before the answer of the witnesses is read the Chair desires to have read a part of Rule 65, which relates to a great

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives :

The undersigned "returning officers for all elections in the State of Louisiana," in obedience to the order of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th day of January, A. D. 1877, directing such officers to answer for a contempt of the authority of said House and breach of its privilege in refusing to produce to the special committee of which Hon. William R. Morrison is chairman, sitting in New Orleans, certain papers in obedience to a subporna duces tecum, now beg to submit the following answer:

The undersigned desire, in the outset, to state most explicitly that in every act of theirs in the premises stated in said resolution of the House they, and each of them, acted under and with the most sincere respect and deference for the dignity and authority of the House, and of its committee, and under the desire and purpose, in all good faith, to submit to and obey every just authority and lawful requirement of such House and committee in the premises; and if any act of the undersigned or of either of them, in all the premises aforesaid was a breach of the just privileges of such House, then it was not intended as such, but was done without any purposes of fraud, of disobedience to lawful authority, or of other wrong, and solely in the honest purpose faithfully to discharge official duty as sworn of the said State of Louisiana.

But the undersigned respectfully submit that they have not, in law or fact, violated any privilege of the House of Representatives nor rendered themselves in any wise justly amenable to be treated as in contempt of its authority; and in support of this most respectfully submit to the House the following as an imperfect statement of the grounds upon which the undersigned relied, and now rely, in justification of their conduct in refusing to surrender the papers named in the subpone of the House.

deposit had no manner of power or control over any papers named in said subposition.

7. The following are some of the provisions of law and elements of the duties of said canvassing board which required their constant and uninterrupted possession and use of said papers demanded by said subposita. The said returns and other documents were not received by said board from the entire State until the 29th of November, and the canvass, investigations, and returns were required to be completed by undersigned and the results officially certified as to the Federal electors before the 6th day of December, 1876, which required the utmost diligence and incessant labor by the said board to be devoted to such electors up to the 6th day of December, 1876, when the canvass as to them was complete. The said board is compelled to canvass and determine upon the election of every officer elected by the people in the State, from the constables to the governor, members of Congress, Federal electors, and members of both houses of the Legislature; and such houses are organized upon the certificates furnished by said board, and such organization must take place upon the first Monday in January, and the executive officers of such State are inaugurated upon the second Monday in January, of which officers the undersigned were required to canvass and determine upon the election of those already above named.

such State are inaugurated upon the second Monday in January, of which officers the undersigned were required to canvass and determine upon the election of those already above named.

Said board is moreover compelled to complete their said labors before they shall adjourn. There were affidavits showing intimidation, violence, &c., from a majori y of the parishes of said State, resulting in imposing upon said board very great labor, involving protracted investigations, in order to the right discharge of the duties above indicated, and which are peremptorily imposed by law on the undersigned, duties which could not be either omitted or delayed without involving both a disregard of the most important and delicate sworn duty, and endangering the existence of the government of Louisiana.

S. It was under this state of fact and of law, and when the undersigned had just completed the returns for presidential electors, (which were disposed of first because of the earlier time at which their duties must be discharged,) and when the returns for all of the Representatives in Congress, members of the Legislature, and officers of the State government were not canvassed or determined, and when the undersigned were in the diligent discharge of their said duties so requiring the constant and indispensable examinations and use of the said papers, that said committee, by said subpoma, demanded the surrender to the committee of every official paper in possession of undersigned, and which was indispensable to any progress in the duties of the said board, and this surrender to of course continue at the pleasure of the House or it maders in the surrender to the pleasure of the House or said soord, and this surrender to of course continue at the pleasure of the House or said town mittee.

and this surrender to of course continue at the pleasure of the House or its committee.

The statement of facts and law now made we have striven to make as condensed as is possible consistently with the complex character of the election laws of Louisia and in the history of its state trials may be perpetually recorded the prounds upon which the undersigned are arraigned as violators of the law, deserving imprisonment and other severe punishment.

Having stated these elements of this case we feel that it is neither needful nor produce the several propers of the committee of the transition of the facts and law which we have given.

Proliminary to this we deem it proper to state that while the undersigned fully adhere to the view which is quoted in the report of the committee from a commuication by the undersigned to the committee, that these demanded papers are "a part of the records of the returning officers of elections for the State of Louisian arily quasi-judicial; that their action, under the law of their creation, is final to the extent provided by the law, and is not subject to review by any State or national ribunal; "yet it is not at all necessary to a complete vindication of the refusal to surrender said papers, under the demand of said subpoena, that the undersigned should call in question the right of the House to cenumie into the caracter of said a government is of course competent to command and carry anywhere its own records, yet, as between the United States and each State, neither the Congress nor much less either House thereof hath any power not expressly granted or necessary to some grant; and the seizure or aspertation of the public journals of a Legislature, or of the records of a State court, or of the returns of the elections of entire State governments, was never before, since the formation of the Constitution, claimed as part of the Federal power over States. As to the character of the evidence which the committee may demand the States or their officials shall surrender to the committee, the committee is bound by the law of the land as much as are the courts.

Even when the tribunal demanding the paper has the unquestioned power to command its production "it is in every instance," to adopt the language of Lord Ellenbrough, (9 East, 485). "a question for the consideration of the judge at niss prius whether upon the principles of reason and equity such production should be required of him." Did the committee possess the power to take these records from the State, still to take them at such a time and under conditions which would imperil the government of a State, and yet not secure even the inspection of a single paper, of which both inspection and copies were not tendered to the committee, would, we submit, not be either reasonable or equitable. But to so seize these papers when the committee has no more jurisdiction or powers to do so than has a committee power to seize and carry off. the journals of the Legislature, or all the archives of a State, seems to the undersigned an act of usurpation that neither the committee nor House will carry out after mature deliberation.

The attempt which is made to bring this demand for the surrender of the most vital records of one of the States to the exclusive custody of a committee of one of the States to the exclusive custody of a committee of one of the States to the exclusive custody of a committee this custody is the more likely to commit a forgery as to these records, then that presumption is not against that custodian with whom alone the law has intrusted them.

Next this attempt is unjust because, as we have seen, the law in section 43 has carefully deposited with the clerk of the district court of every parish in the State these same returns or tally-lists, showing every vote of the State; and being exact copies of the material and vital paper attempted to be wrested by this subpena from the said board; so that not only could the committee get the returns from every polling-place in the State without arresting the proceeding of such board and endangering the government of the State, but the resort to such forgery and alteration was thereby rendered useless and its detection inevitable unless the forgery were in the said duplicate also. This because the inspection of the duplicate in the clerk's office would both detect and correct the fraud.

If the forgery were in the duplicate also, then its inspection would expose the fraud, and the seizure to those with the board was needless.

Next this allegation of necessity for wresting from the board these documents in order to see if any were forged is most unjust for another reason, namely, that not only did the board tender and furnish copies of every paper demanded, but also to the said committee of the House and also to the eminent representatives of that party which is in the majority in this House, said board did tender full, complete, and ample inspection of the originals of every paper and return relating to such election as soon as the same were opened by the board, and of that opportunity to inspect said original documents, such representatives availed themselves to the full lest extent. The undersigned answer by saying to the House that their omission to surrender said papers was in no degree from any disrespect for the authority of this House or of said committee, was in no degree owing to any purpose to either committor occased any wrong, fraud of said board, every original paper, the surrender of which was demanded by said subpena.

We conclude this answer by making this appeal to the House, and say that, conceding, for the sake of the argument, that the committee is entitled in this its investigation to ascertain by lawful means the result of the presidential election in Louisiana, it seems impossible that the undersigned should be mistaken when they deemed it their duty to decline to submit to the seizure of the archives of the State; Archives absolutely and completely indispensable to the continued peaceful existence for even a month thereafter; archives attempted to be carried off at the very moment of their being canvassed for the vital purpose of ascertaining who should compose the new government and of securing the inauguration thereof. If such things may be done by a committee of Congress, in the absence of the semblance of a grant of the power thus to lay its hands upon the States, then the undersigned, with great respect to the House, would inquire where, in all the history and processes of government, will you find more cruel mockery or unalleviated folly than is contained in such utterances as these, which we now repeat, from the highest is contained in such utterances as these, which we now repeat, from the highest sources of our law:

"The United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, none but such as are expressly given by necessary implication. " * "The States, within the limits of their powers not granted to the United States, are as independent of the General Government as that Government within its sphere is independent of the States. * "The means and instrumentalities employed by the States, for carrying on the operations of their governments, for preserving their existence, and fulfilling the high and responsible duties assigned to them in the Constitution should be left free and unimpaired, and should not be liable to be crippled, much less defeated by acts of the General Government." (See Nelson in 11 Wallace, 124, 125.)

stitution should be left free and unimpaired, and should not be liable to be crippled, much less defeated by acts of the General Government." (See Nelson in 11 Wallace, 124, 125).

In exercising their power to make inquest as well as in every other parliamentary function, neither House nor any committee thereof can declare or make their own privileges, but are subject to the law of the land, and the proposition that either House, by a resolution declaring its privileges, "can alter the law or place anyone beyond its control, is wholly untenable and abhorrent to the first principles of the Constitution." (Lord Denman, C. J., 9 Adolphus and Ellis, 1.)

The undersigned did not, and now do not, seek to avail themselves of any doubtful legal claims in resistance of the demand of the committee; but finding, as they do, that, even when there was no attempt to cross the boundary between the jurisdiction of the General Government and that of the States or to invade the powers of the one by the process of the other, Chief-Justice Marshall accorded to the officers of the executive department the discretion to decide for reasons of state what public papers the courts might demand from the public offices, and declared even as to private papers that the Executive "may have sufficient motives for declining to produce a particular paper, and those motives may be such as to restrain the court from enforcing its production," (Burr's trial;) when Jefferson, in the same trial, declared that the law "reserved the necessary right of the President of the United States to decide independently of all other authority what papers coming to him as President, the public interest permits to be communicated and to whom," (I Burr's Trial, 210:) when, by the unanimous judgment of the highest courts of the States, it is solemnly declared that "papers submitted to the executive council for the purpose of enabling it to perform its functions and filed among its archives ought not to be withdrawn" by subpeane duces tecum, "without its order, (2 Vi gery.

The undersigned have now concluded their answer. They thank the House for this opportunity to make it, and submit their rights as officers and their liberty as citizens to the protection of the laws of the land.

Mr. LYNDE. I ask whether this answer is sworn to.

The SPEAKER, (after the Clerk had made an examination.) There seems to be no indication that it is.

Mr. LYNDE. I suppose that the answer should properly be sworn to before it is received by the House.

Mr. HALE. That is not necessary.

Mr. LYNDE. Of course the House can waive the requirement that the answer should be noder oath, but usually it is required.

Mr. HALE. Why, Mr. Speaker, there has been no order for an answer under oath.

Mr. LYNDE. It requires no special order. Parliamentary law requires that the answer should be under oath.

Mr. KASSON. No; not in a case of this kind.

The SPEAKER. The practice on this question has varied. Under

Mr. KASSON. An order of the House is required, instead of an order of the Speaker.

Mr. LYNDE. I waive that point. I now call the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to one point in the first resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the witness can be sworn now.

Mr. LYNDE. I do not care about their being sworn.
Mr. KASSON. I will say to the gentleman that there is no purpose to take dilatory action in this matter; but I wish to call his attention for a moment to one point in the first resolution.

Mr. LYNDE. I move the first resolution be acted on at this time under the previous question. If gentlemen prefer to have a separate vote on this resolution, I will not raise objection.

Mr. KASSON. I wish particularly to call attention to what the gentleman himself will see to be the effect of the first resolution, upon his own theory of action.

Mr. LYNDE. I will hear the gentleman's suggestion.
Mr. KASSON. It is this: the first resolution does not say for what less witnesses are in contempt.

Mr. LYNDE. It is not necessary. The House is already advised.

Mr. KASSON. Allow me as to that to say this: The recital is of a disobedience to a subpœna that required them to appear and testify and to produce certain papers. They did appear and testify. They did not produce the certain papers. The contempt should be recited to be in the non-production of papers, because there was no contempt in respect to the first demand upon them.

Mr. LYNDE. It is not necessary for this House or any other par-liamentary body to set forth in the order of arrest the ground of con-tempt. It is sufficient if by order of the House the witness is claimed to be in contempt.

If I were declared to be in contempt without stat-Mr. KASSON. Mr. KASSON. It I were declared to be in contempt without stating what for, would the gentleman justify that on principle? Can a man, consistently with American law, be sent to prison and deprived of his liberty without the record showing what it was for? Is it enough to show he has been guilty of crime?

Mr. LYNDE. It is perfectly plain from the records and proceedings in this case what the cause is. The reason has been shown already why these witnesses are in contempt. It is not necessary in very order to be acted on by this House the cause shall be repeated.

Mr. KASSON. It is the first time the House has been asked to give a judgment of contempt. This, now, is adjudication.

a judgment of contempt. This, now, is adjudication.
Mr. LYNDE. Yes, sir.
Mr. KASSON. And being adjudication it should state what for, or there is left no protection for anybody.
Mr. LYNDE. I demand the previous question.
Mr. REAGAN. If the only ground stated be for failure to produce papers that would not cover the case, because the subpœna required them to appear, produce papers, and answer questions.
Mr. KASSON. They did answer questions.
Mr. LYNDE. I demand the previous question on both resolutions.
Mr. KASSON. How can they purge themselves of this contempt?
Mr. LYNDE. By appearing before the committee and producing these papers; and then the committee will report to the House that these papers; and then the committee will report to the House that they have purged themselves by producing the papers called for.

Mr. KASSON. Then why not say so in the resolution?

Mr. LYNDE. Because it is not necessary.

Mr. KASSON. These men ought to be willing to go to jail upon the principle shown in their answer.

Mr. LYNDE. I demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. I wish it to be understood that I ask for a separate vote on the first resolution.

The SPEAKER. After the previous question has been seconded it is within the province of the gentleman from Iowa to ask for a separate vote on either resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I demand the yeas and nays on the first resolution, which punishes for contempt in not robbing the archives of a State. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first resolution on which the vote is now to be taken will be read. The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson, G. Casanave, and Louis M. Kenner be, and are hereby, adjudged to be in contempt for a violation of the privileges of this House.

PAYMENT OF JAMES B. EADS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4540) to provide for the payment of James B. Eads for the construction of jetties and other auxiliary works to make a wide and deep channel between the South Pass of the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico, under contract with the United States.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, on the 9th day of January, 1877, C. B.

Comstock, major of engineers, in a communication to the War Department, said:

Little work has been done since my last report. Soon after the decision of the commission that the paragraphs in the jetty law, authorizing payments to James B. Eads, do not require a channel through the shoal at the head of the pass prior to such payments, work there was stopped and the dredges were set at work at places of narrow-channel width at the mouth of the pass. Aided by three new wing-dams, they have the twenty-foot channel there to two hundred feet.

Now it was in consequence of this construction that the completion of this work was precipitated upon the War Department and upon the House and prevented the proper appropriation being made. When this bill was passed there were first given eight months to commence the work and thirty months were given to complete it up to the first payment. The War Department has been active and attentive and has exercised all reasonable care in obtaining information and com-municating it to the House on this subject.

This House has been reasonably careful of the matter and all the committee asks is that under this state of facts the Government will have the right to elect whether they shall pay in money or in bonds.

It was only on January 19 that the opinion of the Attorney-General was had upon this matter. There is no injury to Captain Eads. It would be an outrage upon the Government should he be paid in bonds. Gentlemen upon the other side insist that, if the money is appropriated now instead of bonds, next year whenever this payment shall become due, then further delay will be brought about to the injury of Captain Eads. I desire to say to the House that there is nothing in this objection. The committee, with a view of hurrying this appropriation, in conformity with the urgent request of the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to save to the Government $60,000, have thought it fit to disencumber this payment from any other payment, so that it can come as a simple question to the House without delay, and we may be enabled to comply with the contract of the Government. The committee propose to act in good faith with Captain Eads, and before concluding this session we shall make an appropriation to

Mr. CLYMER. This question, to my mind, is one so simple that its mere statement should be conclusive upon the minds of members. Under an act of Congress of 1875, the Government made a contract with Captain Eads to open the South Pass of the Mississippi River. He was to be paid $500,000 on the completion of a certain portion of that work. If there was no appropriation made for the payment of the $500,000, the Secretary of the Treasury was, on the warrant of the Secretary of War, to issue to him $500,000 in United States bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest.

This work, sir, is alluded to in the report of the Secretary of War to Congress made on the 30th November, in which the Secretary of War stated that on the completion of the work, as far as now advanced, $500,000 would be needed on or before the 1st day of February. On the 17th day of January of this year the Secretary of War was informed that enough work had been done to warrant the paywas informed that enough work had been done to warrant the payment of $500,000. On the 22d of this month the Attorney-General had given his opinion that the money should be paid now. Here we have an opinion of the Secretary of War and of the Secretary of the Treasury. Both are clear that we have a right at any time before the 1st of February to pay the $500,000 in the lawful money of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury wanted to pay in this mode. Captain Eads wanted it paid in bonds worth 12 per cent. premium; he wants the $500,000 paid in bonds worth $560,000. I ask the House if they are prepared to do that. Now, mark you, if this bill does not pass the House to-night and the Senate on Monday or Tuesday and receive the President's signature before the first of February, then the Government will have to pay in bonds worth $560,000 a debt of $500,000. We have now cash in the Treasury to pay, it and we are ready to pay it. The Secretary of the Treasury says we ought to pay it in eash, it. The Secretary of the Treasury says we ought to pay it in cash, and it can only be by the default of the House to make the appropriation that we shall lose this opportunity. I beg gentlemen to consider whether they are prepared to do that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to call the previous question on the amend-

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to make a statement.
Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend will call the previous question when he concludes, I will yield to him for five minutes.
Mr. FOSTER. I will do so.
Mr. HOLMAN. After the gentleman from Ohio has occupied five minutes which I yield to him, I will call the previous question, but he fore calling the previous question. I find that there is something in minutes which I yield to him, I will call the previous question, but before calling the previous question I find that there is something in the phraseology of the bill which requires correction.

Mr. FOSTER. It is true that Captain Eads was to have $500,000 upon the completion of a certain portion of his work. He was to have it according to the law, which has been read here, in United States bonds, unless the Congress of the United States had previously appropriated the money to pay him. Now, the Secretary of War has called the attention of the House to the fact that on or before the 1st day of February this money would be needed.

of War has called the attention of the House to the fact that on or before the 1st day of February this money would be needed.

Mr. CAULFIELD. When was that?

Mr. FOSTER. On the 1st day of December. On that day the Secretary called the attention of the House to the fact that the money would be needed on or before the 1st day of February. I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I regret that I did not pay that attention to my duties that I should have done in regard to this matter. I should have known that this demand would be made upon the Treasury before the 1st day of February, but we paid no at-

Mr. Floorer. The Secretary of war cancer our accention to the 19th of January.

Mr. FOSTER. I am willing to say that I did not know it; if I did it escaped my attention. Now, sir, the law requires that Captain Eads shall be paid in 5 per cent. bonds unless we previously appropriate the money to pay him.

Mr. HOLMAN. Previous to what?

Mr. FOSTER. Previous to the completion of the work.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no.

Mr. FOSTER. O, yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Previous to paying the bonds.
Mr. FOSTER. I am as willing to save what there is of premium upon the bonds to the Government of the United States as any one upon the bonds to the Government of the United States as any one can be; but I do say that if it had been a transaction between me and a private individual, and he had taken the position which gentlemen on the other side take upon this question, I would consider it an attempt to swindle me out of my rights. Public faith demands that we should live up to the letter and the spirit of the contract which requires us to deliver these bonds, because we have neglected to make the appropriation of money for the purpose. I am willing to take some share of the responsibility upon myself. It is true the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations should have known better; but he did not provide for this, and Captain Eads is entitled to his bonds. to his bonds.

If the the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that demand in order that I may be heard a moment upon this question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot yield. I desire to say—

Mr. CONGER. I object to the gentleman saying anything until I have had an opportunity to speak, for he has already spoken more then tries were this prevention.

than twice upon this proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much time does the gentleman ask?

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House he could have but

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that at the expiration of the gentleman's five minutes I can be recognized to call the previ-ous question, I will withdraw it for the present.

Mr. CONGER. A short time ago Congress, after trying many ways Mr. CONGER. A short time ago Congress, after trying many ways to open the Mississippi to the ocean with its great commerce, received a proposition from one man to himself spend millions of dollars of his own money and of the money of his associates, in an effort to do what few men thought could be accomplished. Congress through its committee bound him by a law, strict, accurate, technical, searching, preventing him from ever receiving from the Government of the United States one dollar, however much he might expend, unless he did open that great channel to the sea with twenty feet depth of water and two hundred feet width of channel with that denth: water and two hundred feet width of channel with that depth; a depth of water that since the oldest man in this House was born has never been afforded for the commerce of the Mississippi Valley.

To-day that channel is open, and our vessels drawing twenty feet of water can rush in, without a pilot, without a guide, between those jetties and reach a harbor of safety, as has been done within the last ten days. That proves that this work has been done. The Engineer Department declares that it has been done. The world knows it has been done, for thousands of eyes have been looking to see whether that work could be done and when it was done.

I was on the committee that prepared the bill under which this contract was made. I was doubtful of the success of this undertaking, and I endeavored to bind the contract as in a vise, so as to preing, and I endeavored to bind the contract as in a vise, so as to prevent Captain Eads or any of his associates from drawing one dollar from the Treasury of the United States until this grand work in favor of commerce was absolutely and actually accomplished. That committee put into the bill a clause, harsh and severe as it may seem, that not one dollar should ever be paid from the Treasury for this work until the result had been absolutely accomplished. Then was the time, when it was accomplished, for this nation not only to return thanks to Mr. Eads, but to pay this benefactor of the Mississippi Valley, of the United States, and of the world. We said that he should have the bonds of the United States, the 5 per cent. bonds, and that when the Secretary of War declared that the work was done and drew his warrant for the pay, unless Congress had previously appropriated money for the purpose, Captain Eads should have the bonds of the United States. Shall this nation, after the accomplishment of such a work, keep this man out of what is due to him, a man who has been paying 100, 150, 200 per cent. for the money with which he had done the work, and is still paying it; shall we haggle for days and weeks over a technicality, ay, even without a technicality? and weeks over a technicality, ay, even without a technicality? Why not give this man, the benefactor of his country, the bonds to which he is entitled?

Gentlemen say it is paying him $60,000 more than to pay him in money. These bonds are to be paid in thirty years; and who knows what they will be worth in money at that time? They pay but 5 per cent. interest. If it is an advantage to Captain Eads, who has made his negotiations since this money was due, since he had no reason to doubt that the bonds would be forthcoming, and has made his arrangements upon the bonds, if it would be an advantage to him to receive the bonds why not pay them to him? A great injury will re-receive the bonds why not pay them to him? A great injury will result to him if he does not receive them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to substitute for the bill—

Mr. FOSTER. I thought the previous question was to be called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana desires to modify the bill.

The language of the bill as prepared by the Attorney-General and sent to us by the Secretary of the Treasury contains the words, "whenever the Secretary of War shall have determined that that amount is due." I desire to substitute the bill sent to us containing those words for the one reported. I now call the previous question upon the bill and substitute.

A joint resolution in reference to the remonetization of silver.

A joint resolution in reference to the remonetization of silver.

Whereas the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States has recently by a large majority passed a bill to restore to silver coin the legal-tender character for all amounts, which it possessed from the foundation of our Government down to the year 1872, and the said bill is now pending before the United States Senate: Therefore

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota: First. That our Senators in the Congress of the United States are hereby requested to use all proper efforts to secure the passage of said bill at as early a date as practicable.

Second. That they are also requested to secure such legislation as will enable all parties owning silver bullion to have the same coined at the mints of the United States, and without regard to the amount of silver coin in circulation.

Third. That it shall be the duty of the secretary of state to forward copies of this preamble and resolution to our Senators in Congress.

[SEAL.]

Secretary of State.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the passage of the bill (S. No. 547) for the relief of settlers upon certain lands in the State of Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and is as follows:

A joint resolution requesting the House of Representatives of our National Congress to pass Senate file No. 547, a bill for the relief of certain settlers on odd-numbered sections.

numbered sections.

Whereas an act of Congress approved June 22, 1874, granting rights to settlers on odd-numbered sections within the limits of the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad, Brainerd and Saint Vincent extension or branches, has been held to be inoperative by the Secretary of the Interior;

And whereas a large number of worthy and needy settlers are thus rendered virtually homeless who are citizens of Minnesota;

And whereas the Senate of the United States, on the 30th day of June, 1876, pa-sed Senate file No. 547, a bill for the relief of all settlers along said extension, which is now pending before the House of Representatives: Therefore, Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Minnesota, That the passage of said Senate file No. 547, for the protection of actual settlers opposite the said branch lines of road, is hereby urgently requested.

Resolved, further, That the secretary of state shall immediately forward copies of these resolutions to Senators and Representatives in Congress, and one copy to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

J. L. GIBBS. Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Secretary of State.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY presented the petition of Professor S. Fleming and 11 other citizens of Burr Oak, Michigan, praying for the imperative adoption of the metric system in all kinds of measurement required under the authority of the Federal Government; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of citizens of Spartanburgh County, South Carolina; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as fol-

At a meeting of the citizens of the eastern portion of Spartanburgh County, held at Gaffney City on 20th January, 1877, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted, the meeting being composed of citizens of both races and both political parties:

whereas D. H. Chamberlain, esq., in opposition to the will of the people as shown at the ballot-box the 7th November, 1876, and in open violation of the laws and constitution of the State of South Carolina, is now usurping the governorship of said State; and whereas General Wade Hampton did, on the aforesaid 7th November, 1876, receive a majority of all the votes cast for governor, as has been fully shown and set forth by a certificate signed by the secretary of state, with the great seal of the same attached thereto; and whereas Colonel W. D. Simpson and certain other persons running on the democratic State ticket did receive a majority of the votes cast for their respective offices: Therefore, *Resolved*, 1. That we recognize General Wade Hampton as the duly elected governor of the State, and we hereby promise to give him and the government he represents all the material and moral aid in our power. We hereby pledge ourselves to respond cheerfully to his request for an installment of the taxes now due.

2. That we approve and commend his course thus far, and we have all confidence in him as our chosen standard-bearer.

3. That we do hereby earnestly and solemnly protest against all acts, orders, and proclamations pretending to be official, and coming from the aforesaid D. H. Chamberlain, esq. or from the unlawful body known as the "Mackey house," and we refuse to yield any allegiance or support to the so-called government of D. H. Chamberlain, esq.

4. That we earnestly desire a peaceable settlement of the existing difficulties and greater harmony between the races so long kept in antagonism by Federal and State misrule; and in order to bring about these results we pledge ourselves that in making our resistance to tyranny and usurpation we will avail ourselves of only those rights and privileges accorded to free citizens by the laws and constitution of our State and the United States.

5. That a copy of this preamble and resolutions be forwarded to Hon. T. J. Robertson, United States Senator, to be laid befor Preamble.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of Samuel P. Moore, M. D., of Richmond, Virginia, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of Albert Cingrid, a citizen of Washington, District of Columbia, praying that an order be made directing the collector of taxes not to issue any deeds to the District or any other person of any of his property nor try to enforce the collection of taxes thereon by advertising or otherwise until his claims shall have been settled, and then to deduct the amount of such of said taxes as may then be due from the amount adjudged to him out of his said claims, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SARGENT. I have received resolutions of the Chamber of Com-merce of San Francisco with the request that they be presented to the Senate. They resolve that in the opinion of the chamber the inthe senate. They resolve that in the opinion of the chamber the interests of commerce and the prosperity of the country will be subserved by maintaining gold coin as the sole standard of values in all transactions above the sum of $5; that the almost daily variation in the relative value of gold and silver is a strong and conclusive illustration of the maxim, taught alike by philosophy and experience, that no legislative enactment can maintain a fixed and permanent relation between gold and silver or any other two products of human industry. I believe there is a special committee to whom this subject has been referred, and the Committee on Finance also have charge of the matter. I move that these resolutions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOGY. Presented a petition of a number of citizens of Saint Louis, Missouri, praying an amendment of the pension laws so as to allow arrearages of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOGY. In this connection I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] who is chairman of the Committee on Pensions, as to what has become of the bill which passed the House some time ago securing to soldiers who served in the Mexican war a pension. I believe the bill is before his committee.

Mr. INGALLS. It is still before the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOGY. I have received many letters upon that subject from a

Mr. BOGY. I have received many letters upon that subject from a number of my constituents urging the passage of that bill. Therefore I make the inquiry in the hope that it will be acted upon by the Senate at an early day.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill to which the Senator from Missouri refers is still before the committee, but I take this occasion to say that I gave notice last week that on this morning I would call up for consideration the bill granting additional pension to the soldiers of the war of 1812 and also arrears of pension to those now upon the roll. I observe by the Calendar that the Pacific Railroad bill is the unfinished business for this morning, and I wish now to renew the notice I gave last week that, upon the expiration of the consideration of the bill now before the Senate, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the pension bill.

Mr. ALCORN. I present the memorial of E. H. Crump, of Missis Mr. ALCORN. I present the memorial of E. H. Crump, of Mississippi, praying the enactment of a law providing for the payment of United States Treasury warrants Nos. 4926 and 4669, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; and I will state to the committee that duplicates of the warrants are filed with the memorial, and that the petitioner will present the originals before the com-

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present a petition of Russel Gilbert and many others, of Wyoming, Jones County, Iowa, reciting that the war taxes, both heavy and unequal in their burden, are imposed on the national banks, State banks, savings-banks, and private bankers of this country, which taxes have been for several years productive of great commercial injury, and praying that these war taxes may be entirely removed. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK presented a petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying the repeal of the law imposing a tax on the deposits, circulation, and capital of all banks; which was referred to the Committee on

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present the petition of L. A. Hardacker and others, of Ellington, Outagamie County, Wisconsin, praying the passage of the bill allowing pensioners the amount of arrears to which they would be entitled by a removal from the statutes of the unjust limitation which has debarred many from receiving their just dues, and that they shall be entitled to receive in all cases pensions from the date of discharge of the soldier. A bill has been reported upon this subject, and I move that this petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of Frederick Hinkel, a naturalized citizen, praying the passage of an act of Congress absolving him from his allegiance to the Government of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Angeline Raish, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the Milwaukee Clearing-House Association, favoring the repeal of the laws imposing a tax on the deposits, circulation, and capital of all banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying an amendment of the pension laws so as to allow arrearages of pension; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS. I present a memorial signed by a number of citizens of West Virginia in favor of the electoral bill, or the "compromise bill" as it is known. The memorial is signed by a large number of the business men of West Virginia irrespective of party, and deserves the respect of Congress and the nation. As that bill has passed the Senate, I move that the memorial lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present the protest of Hon. Samuel Merrill and many other citizens of Des Moines, Iowa, against the Edmunds bill for counting the electoral vote, and requesting the Iowa delegation in Congress to use their influence against it.

In sending this protest to the desk of the Secretary that it may there lie upon the table, the supposed obnoxious bill having passed, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I say one word.

This protest is signed by near one hundred of the best citizens, including one lady, of my State and of the city where I reside. I believe they are all republicans, and among them I find an ex-governor, neve they are all republicans, and among them I and an ex-governor, ex-lieutenant-governor, State officers, those holding and well filling places of the highest official trust, and citizens of the very highest respectability. They are my immediate neighbors and my warmest friends, personal and political. Than these protestants I know but few if any, in the State or elsewhere, whose opinions are entitled to more respectful consideration, whose judgments would more command my respect. I know they are intelligent, thoughtful, and most worthy and law-abiding sitizens.

If, as they assume, the bill to which they refer "ignored the decision of the electors and permitted a third party and possibly one judge of the Supreme Court to elect a President"—I say if I granted judge of the Supreme Court to elect a President "—I say if I granted this I should be ready to concur most heartily in their conclusion as to "the unconstitutionality of said bill and that it tended most clearly to subvert the rights of the States." The protest itself, however, shows beyond any fair doubt that these my good friends misapprehend the entire scope and purpose of the legislation which they condemn, and that their objections are hence quite consistent and reasonable enough. Indeed upon their assumption it would command my approval, and I doubt not that of my colleague and of every member of approval, and I doubt not that of my colleague and of every member of our delegation.

I voted for the bill, voted for it with, as I trust, a full understanding of its provisions and with the belief, too, that under it a result would be reached which, as nearly as possible, would command the respect and acquiescence of the people of this great nation. I entertained no doubts, nor do I now, of its constitutionality, nor any of its expediency. And let me say that no shadow of fear, no dread of consequences, no apprehension of possible resistance to any other plan or method of counting the vote even for a moment crossed my mind.

method of counting the vote, even for a moment crossed my mind.

I knew quite well then, as I do now, that the earnest, ever-faithful, true radical people of Iowa of my party would at first be almost unanimously opposed to it. They believe, as I do, that but one result can be the true and honest one, and are hence inclined to look with suspicion upon anything which tends to complicate or in their opinion render the final result in the least doubtful. But I know their intelligence, their readiness to hear all sides and decide as justice and the behests of the law shall lead them. To the saving common sense of this reasonable and intelligent people I shall commit the final judgment. If we cannot rely upon this good sense of all the people in this country, we cannot upon anything. Than the prac-tical wisdom of the whole body of our citizens, there is nothing upon which we can so surely rely for a satisfactory solution of the great problems before us, upon nothing else so safely depend to sustain the future of the great Republic. Thus feeling and thus believing, with a confidence that admits of no shadow of doubt, I submit my action upon this as upon all measures, knowing that if I err, as I do often, the relative to the re the sober judgment of the people is ever, in the end, to be trusted. That this will be so upon the measure which my good friends now condemn, I do not and will not entertain a doubt.

Let the protest go to the table, as the bill has already passed. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will lie on the table.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. CONOVER. I am authorized to announce that the President of the United States has signed the bill (8. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, and will send a special message to-day announcing the fact and his reasons therefor.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

No. 1198) authorizing the printing and binding of a catalogue of the National Medical Library, under the direction of the Surgeon-General United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1199) to establish a post route in Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Royals.

to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (8. No. 1200) to grant a pension to Margaret Hunter Hardie, widow of James A. Hardie, inspector-general United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALCORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1201) to authorize the United States Treasurer to take up, cancel, and pay certain United States warrants therein described; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That Patrick Sullivan have leave to withdraw his petition and papers rom the files on leaving copies of the same with the Secretary.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. INGALLS. A few days since I offered a resolution to amend Rule 43. I ask the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which he has indicated

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. INGALLS on the 26th in-

Resolved. That Rule 43 be so amended as to read, after the word "arranged," in line 13, as follows:

Motions to adjourn, to take a recess, to proceed to executive business, and to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. CONKLING. Not having been able thus far to read our new rules, I beg to make an inquiry of the Chair. Has the rule been so changed that a motion is no longer in order that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet at a certain fixed time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is in force to allow a motion that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet at a certain time. Mr. CONKLING. And that is a motion separate from the motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CONKLING. If the amendment prevails, where will that motion come in, in its order of precedence, if it has any?

Mr INGALLS. With the permission of the Chair—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas.
The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the rule as it now stands.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

43. When a question is pending no motion shall be received but—

43. When a question is pending no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn,
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
To take a recess,
To proceed to the consideration of executive business,
To lay on the table,
To postpone indefinitely,
To postpone to a day certain,
To commit,
To amend.

To amend :

To amend; which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged; and the motion relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to executive business, and to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Secretary read again now the three lines enumerating in the rule as it stands the motion to adjourn ?

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to executive usiness, and to lay on the table shall be decided without debate.

Mr. CONKLING. But before that the enumeration of the motions where the words occur, "to a day certain." The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To adjourn ; To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain;

To take a recess;
To proceed to the consideration of executive business;
To lay on the table;
To postpone indefinitely;
To postpone to a day certain;
To commit;
To amend;
which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged.

Mr. CONKLING. As I understand, then, the first motion, the monaked motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CONKLING. Next, the motion to adjourn to a day certain; and next, that, when the Senate adjourn, it be to a day certain.

next, that, when the Senate adjourn, it be to a day certain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They stand alike in one paragraph:
"to adjourn to a day certain, or that, when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain." That has the second rank in priority. The first, to adjourn absolutely, a simple adjournment, has priority. This is second; to take a recess is third; to proceed to the consideration of executive business is fourth.

Mr. CONKLING. Now if I do not trouble the Chair too much, may I inquire, suppose a Senator rises and moves that the Senate adjourn until the day after to-morrow; another Senator says, "I wish to move that when the Senate adjourn. it be until the day after toto move that when the Senate adjourn, it be until the day after to-morrow," his purpose being that the Senate continue to sit to-day, but that when the adjournment occurs, it be till the day after to-morrow—as between those motions which has priority by the rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The one made first. As the Senator will see, the object is that, in case the Senate should find itself without a quorum, a simple adjournment, on a prior resolution of that kind to adjourn it to a day fixed by the resolution, would operate to adjourn it to the time fixed. This also gives a Senator the opportunity of moving at a late hour in the day, at the time the Senate wishes to adjourn, to adjourn to a day certain, which has not been the case under the former rule.

Mr. MERRIMON. I suggest to the broadel.

Mr. MERRIMON. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Kansas that he allow this proposed amendment to go to the Committee on Rules. I think they will act upon it very promptly, and they will have opportunities to see exactly its bearings on all the various rules as they now exist.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to the course being taken which is suggested by the Senator from North Carolina; but the Senator from New York evidently misapprehends the purpose of the amendment. The question arose on some day last week whether a amendment. The question arose on some day last week whether a motion to adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain, was a debatable motion, or whether it came in the same category with simple motions to adjourn, which have been held not to be debatable. The language of the new rule is "and the motions relating to adjournment * * * shall be decided without debate," and the Senator then temporarily occupying the chair held that that language was sufficiently comprehensive to include, not only the motion to adjourn, but the motion that when the Senate adjourn it adjourn to a day certain, or that it adjourn to a certain day. As I understood from one member of the Committee on Rules, it was not the intention of the committee in adopting the new rules to preclude debate upon the motion to adjourn to a day certain or that when the Senate adjourn it be to a day certain, but merely to limit debate on the simple question of adjournment. But, as the Senator from North Carolina desires to have the amendment go to the Committee on Rules, I certainly have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. George M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4452) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ANN LYNCH.

Mr. INGALLS. If there is no further morning business, I ask for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 1143. It is merely a private pension bill that I omitted the other day.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 1143) for the relief of the legal heirs of Ann Lynch was gead the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to restore to the pension-roll the name of Ann Lynch, deceased, widow of James Lynch, private Company A, Sixty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteers, and to pay to her legal heirs the pension, at the rate of $8 per month, with $2 for each minor child until it becomes sixteen years of age, subject to the provisions and limitations of the sixteen years of age, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Gordon] recognizing Wade Hampton as governor of South Carolina, for the purpose of allowing me to make some remarks thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. Conney on the 20th December 1876:

GORDON on the 29th December, 1876:

Resolved by the Senate, That the State government now existing in the State of South Carolina, and represented by Wade Hampton as governor, is the lawful government of said State; that it is republican in form; and that every assistance necessary to sustain its proper and lawful authority in said State should be given by the United States, when properly called upon for that purpose, to the end that the laws may be faithfully and promptly executed, life and property protected and defended, and all violators of law, State or national, brought to speedy punishment for their crimes.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it proposed to ask for a vote on that resolution this morning? Mr. ROBERTSON. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the resolution, on which the Senator from South Carolina holds the floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I desire to make some remarks upon the resolution introduced by the Senator from Georgia recognizing Wade Hampton as governor of South Carolina.

The night previous to the 25th of November last, the day of the meeting of the newly elected Legislature, the State-house was garrisoned by United States troops. On the 25th no white person was admitted unless he had a pass from one Jones, clerk of the former house, or from John B. Dennis, ex-superintendent of the penitentiary, both republicans, the latter the special representative of Governor Chamber-

At a quarter before twelve m. the democratic members-elect, numbering sixty-four, appeared at the door of the State-house, which was guarded by United States troops, acting under the direction of Dennis. Upon their demand of admission they were informed by Dennis that they could not enter unless they had certificates from the secretary of state. Thereupon the democrats proceeded to read a protest. Captain Keller of the United States Army, after a conference, said that all persons with certificates either from the secretary of state or the supreme court could enter. The armed guard of United States sol-supreme court could enter. The armed guard of United States soldiers then examined the certificates one by one, and the democrats passed into the lobby of the house.

The democratic members, having thus passed the guard at the outer door and entered the lobby, proceeded in a body to the door of the hall of the house of representatives, on the second story of the building, and demanded admittance, presenting their certificates of election from the supreme court. A squad of United States soldiers guarded the door. A person assuming to act as doorkeeper refused them admission, declaring the supreme court certificates to be insufficient. admission, declaring the supreme court certificates to be insufficient.

admission, declaring the supreme court certificates to be instinctent. The democrats read a protest at the door of the house and retired. The protest, among other things, stated:

We have presented ourselves with the judgment of the highest court of South Carolina, certified by its clerk, with the great seal of the court attached, as to our right to participate in the organization of the house. We are refused, by the orders of said Dennis, admission to the hall, except upon his pass, the pass of Jones, or the certificate of Hayne, secretary of state, who is now under the condemnation of the supreme court for refusal to issue certificates in accordance with its judgment and wenders. ment and mandate.

We protest against the legality of the proceeding, and especially against the Army of the United States being placed for the purpose of this exclusion under the command of one John B. Dennis, a partisan of Governor Chamberlain.

In the mean time the republican members of the house, fifty-nine in number, had without any obstruction taken possession of the hall of the house of representatives and proceeded to organize by electing a speaker and clerk. The republican house, as organized, contained only five white members.

The democrats, accompanied by one republican, being sixty-five in all, assembled in another hall and organized by electing a speaker and other officers. It is proper to remark that the house of representatives consists of one hundred and twenty-four members, of which consequently sixty-three is a majority and quorum.

The constitution of South Carolina provides as follows, article 11, section 4:

The house of representatives shall consist of one hundred and twenty-four mem-

And in section 14:

Each house shall judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members; and a majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business.

From the facts already stated it appears that while the United States guard held the door of the State-house, and so prevented the democrats from entering, the republicans, a minority of the house, under protection of the military, organized as the house of represent-

It is to be observed that in the case before the supreme court of the State, heard before November 28, the court had determined that the persons who had received the highest number of votes on the face of the returns from the counties of Edgefield and Laurens were entitled to seats, at least so far as to participate in organizing the house. It was not denied that these persons were democrats. Yet these persons were refused admission to the hall of the house and were denied all participation in the organization of the house by a so-called door-keeper acting under the illegal authority of a minority of the members-elect, which illegal action was enforced by the bayonets of United States soldiers. It is to be observed that in the case before the supreme court of the States soldiers.

On the 29th of November, the Mackey house, by which term I designate the republican house, unseated the five democratic members from Barnwell County, whose election had been conceded by the board of county and State canvassers, and who held the certificate of the secretary of state, and admitted the five defeated republicans. This was done on mere exparte proceedings, without the democrats who held the certificates of the republican secretary of state being notified or heard in their own defense. This was accomplished by a vote of 45 yeas to 14 nays, and in spite of the protest of several of the members. It is worthy of observation that one of the active participants in this proceeding was one D. A. Straker, a colored member from the British island of Antigua, and who came to the United States since the late civil war ended, and to South Carolina about one year ago.

the late civil war ended, and to South Carolina about one year ago.

It is proper here to note, as a part of the history of these events, that in the midst of these troubles Judge Bond, of the circuit court of the United States, appeared in Columbia, at least some ten days in advance of the regular session of his circuit court, and, on a petition for the writ of habeas corpus, released the members of the board of State canvassers from the imprisonment they were enduring by reason of contempt on their part as State officials in refusing obedience to the mandate of the supreme court of the State.

On the 30th of November the democrats, who had organized a separate house of representatives, took their seats in a body in the hall of the house of representatives where the Mackey house was sitting. The curious spectacle of two speakers and two distinct organizations was thus presented. About three o'clock of this day, November 30, General Ruger, in command of the United States forces, sent one of his staff-officers to the speaker's stand and notified Mr. Wallace, who had been chosen speaker by the democrats, that at twelve o'clock the next day the demo-cratic members from Edgefield and Laurens Counties would be re-quired to leave the hall of representatives. This threat was, however, not carried out by General Ruger.

On the 4th of December a curious incident occurred. It was stated by a member on the floor in the house of representatives, and not denied, that Silas Cave, colored, who had been seated as a member of the Mackey house, had been fraudulently personated by another negro, who had taken his seat and passed off as Silas Cave, Cave being still at home in Barnwell.

On the same day Hamilton and Myers, two member of the Mackey house, withdrew and joined the democratic house.

On this day also Mackey, chosen speaker of the republican house, notified Wallace, speaker of the democratic house, that he intended to eject the Edgefield and Laurens members from the House by means of the State constabulary. To avoid this threatened violence the democratic house withdrew from the State-house. December 6 two of their members, Westberry and Bridges, and a few days after two members from Fairfield County, all of whom had qualified in the Mackey house, joined the democratic or Wallace house. This gave the Wallace house sixty-three members who had certificates from the secretary of state. Including the eight members from Edgefield and Laurens this house now had seventy-one members. Sixty-three holding certificates from the secretary of state was the number which President Grant held necessary to constitute a lawful house.

In the supreme court of the State on that same day judgment was rendered in the mandamus case of Speaker Wallace vs. Hayne, secretary of state, and Mackey, claiming to be speaker, the court adjudging that Wallace was the legal speaker of the legally constituted house of representatives, and that Mackey was not the speaker.

December 8, in an interview with a committee of the democratic house, General Ruger said:

Treops, as they are now placed, are to preserve peace and to prevent interference with the house which Chamberlain recognizes as legal.

General Ruger further said:

The orders [to the troops] come through Chamberlain, recognized by the Presi-

It is to be noted that the laws of South Carolina make no provision for the organization of the house by the clerk. The persons who had received the highest number of votes were the persons to take part in the organization of the house. The late clerk had no more authority than any other private person to determine who were members. Governor Chamberlain, in making his defense for using the troops to exclude the democrats from the house, says:

It was evidently my duty to enforce the authority of the clerk, if I had the

But the clerk had no authority. No mode of organizing the house is provided by law in South Carolina. The clerk, whose term of office had expired, had no right to interfere in any way. The house could only be organized legally by those persons who from the returns appeared to have the highest number of votes, and this was so held by the supreme court. It was objected that the persons receiving the highest number of votes in the counties of Edgefield and Laurens were not lawfully elected. This was a matter which under the provisions of the constitution of South Carolina could only be determined by the house itself after being organized. The returns from the county commissioners of election, the majority of whom were republicans, showed that democrats were elected from Edgefield and Laurens. The house itself was the only judge of their election. The nouse itself was the only judge of their election. The supreme court decided that these persons had a prima facie right to their seats. This decision being the law of the State, the action of the late clerk, Jones, and Governor Chamberlain, in excluding these members from the hall of the house by the use of Federal bayonets, was as absolutely illegal as anything we can conceive of.

In order to the better comprehension of the situation in South Carelina, it must be kept in mind that the election law provides for the appointment of managers of election at each poll, county canvassers of elections, and a State board of commissioners of elections. These were all appointed by republican authority. The majority of the or elections, and a State board of commissioners of elections. These ware all appointed by republican authority. The majority of the county commissioners and managers of elections were republicans. The board of State canvassers, certain State officials, were all republicans, and nearly all of them candidates for re-election.

The returns of the boards of county canvassers show the following result for governor: Hampton, 92,261; Chamberlain, 91,127.

The same returns show the election of the Hayes and Wheeler elect-

The following statement of the decision of the supreme court of the State, heretofore referred to, is submitted as containing useful in:

the State, heretofore referred to, is submitted as containing useful information:

1. Constitutional powers of the court.—Article 4, section 4, of the Constitution, contains the grant of power to the supreme court. After the words giving it appellate jurisdiction, it is provided as follows: "The said court shall always have power to issue writs of injunction, mandamus, quo warranto, habeas corpus, and such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary to give it a general an pervisory control over all other courts in this State."

2. Interpretation of its powers by the court.—This proviso has been thus interpreted by the supreme court in the case of Ex parte Carson (5 So. Ca. Rep., 118.) the Cunningham. Wagener protest case. The section referred to invests the court in the exercise of original powers with anthority to issue writs of injunction, mandamus, quo varranto, and habeas corpus. These are expressly named. They are not confined in any way to the subject matter upon which they may act, either in regard to any particular persons or bodies who are to be affected by their enforcement. The grant of power in relation to them is without restriction, and whatever result may be accomplished through their action by any court having the undoubted right to issue them may be attained in their issue by order of this court.

3. What the court has now done.—The court has so far only issued a writ of mandamus to the board of State canvassers, compelling them to issue certificates of election to all members of the Legislature who appeared, from the returns of the county canvassers, to have received the highest number of votes. It is plain, therefore, that if any court would have the power to issue a mandamus to the board to do this act, the supreme court, under the decision in Carson's case, has such power.

4. The statutory powers of the board.—Chapter 8, section 26, of the general statutes, defines the jurisdiction of the board as follows: "Upon such statements [those of the county canvassers] they shall proceed

Mr. Presisent, the returns of the county canvassers, made to the board of State canvassers, showed the election of Hampton as governor, and the election of other State officers, the election of a minority of the State senate, and a majority of the members of the house of representatives by the democrats. The board of State canvassers, the majority of whom were candidates for offices, in violation of the mandate of the supreme court, refused certificates of election to eight of the democrats elected members of the house of representatives and two democrats elected to the senate.

The United States troops, on the day of the assembling of the Legislature, excluded from the hall of the house all members-elect who did not hold the certificates ordered by the board of State canvassers, which certificates were signed by the secretary of state.

A minority of the lawfully elected members, being republicans, in violation of the law declared themselves a quorum and elected a speaker, Mackey. This minority thereupon admitted as members defeated candidates from counties where, according to the declaration of the heard of State canvassers, the democratic candidates were elected. board of State canvassers, the democratic candidates were elected.

It is proper to call attention also to the following facts:
First. There was a large number of deputy marshals appointed by the United States marshal to preserve order at the polls and prevent intimidation. The number so appointed I have heard estimated as high as twenty-five hundred.

Secondly. The United States troops were stationed at numerous places to prevent intimidation. These troops were stationed at the points indicated by Governor Chamberlain.

When we consider that the majority of the managers of election at every precinct and the majority of the county canvassers were republicans, that the official patronage of the State was controlled by the republican governor, that the influence of the United States officials is on the side of the republicans, it would seem that the republicans d certainly some great advantages in the election. The democrats had certainly some great advantages in the election. The democrats had to struggle against the power of the State and Federal adminis-

As to intimidation, I do not think there was intimidation, so far as

As to intimidation, I do not think there was intimidation, so far as I was able to learn of the blacks, by the whites on the day of election. I think the officers of the Army who were present will so state.

In the first stage of the canvass, in some localities, there may have been, and I think were, efforts made to intimidate, but this policy was, as I have been informed, condemned by General Hampton, and abandoned some time before the election. Hampton, as I understand, justified on winning the blacks by nerrousing and appeals to their ininsisted on winning the blacks by persuasion and appeals to their in-terests, and repudiated the idea of intimidating them. Truth compels me to add that during the canvass in Charleston and Beaufort Counties the colored republicans were violent and aggressive.

As to intimidation, my opinion is very decided that the intimidation by the blacks of the blacks was far more persistent, universal, and effectual than intimidation of blacks by the whites. The vio-lent threats of the blacks against those of their own color who were disposed to vote the democratic ticket did, I am confident, deter many blacks from voting the democratic ticket. This coercion was al-most everywhere, and was something fearful. There was a strong feelmost everywhere, and was something fearful. There was a strong feeling among the majority of blacks that if the democrats succeeded their rights were in danger; many believed they would be reduced to slavery. This apprehension was very much enforced by repub-lican tactics, and the republican blacks were taught to look upon democratic blacks as traitors

In confirmation of what I have said, I desire to have incorporated in my remarks the official report of Colonel Henry I. Hunt, Fifth Artillery, United States Army:

Artillery, United States Army:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 27, 1876.

Assistant Adjutant-General, Department of the South, Atlanta, Georgia.

COLONEL: I have the honor to report, for the information of the colonel commanding the department, the operations of my command from the time it left Summerville, South Carolina, to aid the United States marshal in his duties connected with the election of Tuesday, November 7.

Under specific instructions, I sent Captain Randolph, Fifth Artillery, and twenty men to Beaufort; Lieutenant Baldwin, Fifth Artillery, and ten men, to John's Island; Lieutenant Edgerton, Second Artillery, and eight men, to Adams Run; Lieutenant Jefferson, Fifth Artillery, with ten men, to Strawberry Ferry, and Lieutenant The Artillery, with ten men, to James Island, to be guided by the general provisions of General Orders No. 36, from the headquarters of the Army. All these detachments and the two foot batteries of my command, consisting of Frank's Battery, First Artillery, and Kinsie's, Fifth Artillery, we put in motion so as to reach their respective destinations on the 6th instant, the day before the election. These detachments, except Sherman's, were taken from Randolph's Battery C, Fifth Artillery. They all returned, as directed, on the 9th to Charleston. From the reports of these officers it appears that no actual violence occurred at the polls requiring their interposition. But their presence in the vicinity was doubtless of service.

Captain Randolph states that he found neither marshal nor denuty at Beanfort.

the polls requiring their interposition. But their presence in the vicinity was doubtless of service.

Captain Randolph states that he found neither marshal nor deputy at Beaufort, and that it was reported to him that the United States supervisor was stopped on his way to the polling-place, and, upon showing his papers to the negroes who stopped him, had them taken from him and destroyed, and was obliged to fly for his lite.

Lieutenant Adams reports that at Strawberry Ferry a company of colored men, about forty in number, were marched to the polls with arms, under a leader, said to be one John Lowry, colored, though no riot or disturbance occurred.

Lieutenant Baldwin states that no disturbance connected with the election occurred on John's Island; that leading citizens informed him, and he believed, that this was due to the presence of troops.

Lieutenant Edgerton reports that no disturbance occurred at Adams Run, and that he has every reason to believe that the presence of troops prevented a serious one taking place at the polls.

Lieutenant Jefferson, immediately on his arrival at Walterborough on the evening of the 6th in a conference with the United States marshal. Commissioner Glover, the intendant of the town, and the leaders of both political parties, learned that while they had no apprehensions of disorder at Walterborough they believed that there would be trouble at Blue House polls. Acting on this he marched early next morning to that place, and says he has no doubt that their arrival prevented serious morning to that place, and says he has no doubt that their arrival prevented serious trouble.

In the last three cases these officers report that the danger arose from the disposition of the republican negroes to interfere with those of their own color who desired to vote the democratic ticket. Lieutenant Sherman found a feverish and excited state of feeling existing at James Island, but the presence of his command excited state of feeling existing at James Island, but the presence of his command restored confidence and no disturbance occurred.

Frank's and Kinsie's Batteries reached Charleston on the afternoon of the 6th, and were stationed at the Citadel under the immediate command of Captain Frank. On the morning of the 7th a detachment under Lieutenant Clark, First Artillery, was stationed at Carolina Hall, in the lower part of the town, and another under Lieutenant Adams at the arsenal, (Charleston barracks.) From these two points aid could be readily sent to the deputy marshals if required. Frequent calls were made because of threatened disturbances, but on the arrival of troops quiet was found to prevail, and order was soon restored. The troops were not actually used, I believe, in any case. The election on the whole in the State was remarkably quiet. I visited the voting-place where trouble was most expected, and found good order prevailing until toward evening, when one or two noisy and riotous bands of colored men were gathered at the polls, and these proceeded to parade the streets in a disorderly manner; but, as a whole, the city was quiet, and during the night peaceful.

olored men were gathered at the polls, and these proceeded to parade the streets in a disorderly manner; but, as a whole, the city was quiet, and during the night peaceful.

On the morning of the 8th nothing material occurred. Everything appeared on the surface to be as usual in the town, and I gave directions for the troops to return by the 3 10 p. m. train to their camp at Summerville, unloss I sent different orders. About one p. m., I called on the United States marshal, (Wallace,) who stated that everything was quiet, except a report from Monnt Pleasant that apprehensions existed there from the presence of a company of armed negroes, who had arrived as guard for the poll-boxes. This report the marshal considered exaggerated, stated that the duties of the troops with regard to the elections were over, that I could safely go to Summerville, and that if disturbances did occur he would so telegraph. I then proceeded to the mayor's room at the guard-house, or main police station. He was not there, and, on inquiring of the officers in charge and others of the police, I was told the city was perfectly quiet. Opposite the police station is the court-house, corner of Broad and Meeting, on both fronts of which, and at the city hall, opposite to it on Meeting street, there were large numbers of negroes assembled, and there were gatherings of the same class along the north side of Broad street, extending toward the post-office. They were quite numerous opposite the News and Courier office, where the bulletin-board was exposed. I crossed Broad street from the station-house to the court house, walked among the crowd there, and nothing was done or said to which I could attach any importance in itself, yet the excitement and appearance of these men were such that I apprehended that mischief was brewing. I, therefore, followed down the street toward the post-office, observing the crowd closely, and returning to the city hall in the same way, and was thoroughly convinced that there would be trouble, although there was nothin peacetable. Taking into Broad street, as approximate the statement with meant he informed me that there was a fight going on near the Charleston Hotel. I hurried up to that point and found that the affair was over and the police taking off one or two prisoners.

After sending off a dispatch from the hotel I was returning toward Broad street when I perceived a commotion there, and, upon inquiry, learned from a man running up Meeting street that there was a sections fight going on in Broad street, and that the negroes were firing into the News and Courier office. I sent for the troops at the citadel to hurry down, for I could now hear firing, and saw it was extending westwardly along Broad street. So soon as I reached the court-house I found the firing was heavy near King street, and started toward it, when a policeman ran out of the station-house and asked me to come in there. Immediately three or four negroes on the north side came off the sidewalk and told me to keep on if I desired, that "I would be safe anywhere." I, however, at the request of the policeman, went to the station-house, where the officer in charge was getting out his men, and he appealed to me for assistance in such terms as led me to be lieve that he felt himself too weak to control the riot.

By this time a number of gentlemen, young and old, had arrived and offered their services to me. I informed the police officer that the troops were on their way, but that if he desired the services of those citizens they were at his disposal. Its said he would be glad to have them. They fell in with his force, and as I was giving some directions he interposed, saying in substance that the matter was in his hands. He then started off when I almost immediately heard complaints that the policemen were firing on and bayoneting quiet white people. The troops soon after arrived at the station-house, and additional armed white citizens also responded. Some one of the civil authorities, as I supposed, I do not remember who, then told me that it was essential th the station he all dispersed.

After the conflict had ceased General James Conner proposed to the mayor that they should go through the streets together and direct all persons, white and black, to go to their homes. This proposal was accepted by the mayor and proved effective. In the nean time information was received that at the commencement of the riot boats were started off to James Island for re-inforcements of negroes, and the mayor and General Conner took steps to prevent their landing.

When all this had been done, I proposed sending patrols of soldiers through the streets at intervals during the night to prevent further assemblages, to insure the peace, to which the mayor objected decidedly, saying he wished no patrols of soldiers in the streets. I then ordered the troops back to the citadel, took a carriare, and drove through the city to satisfy myself that all was quiet. There was no disturbance during the night.

Early on the morning of the 9th, Major Berlin, of Charleston, who was acting as my aid, reported that on going to his office on the wharf, near the post-office, he found several hundred longshoremen assembled; they were being harangued by several persons and appeared excited and "ugly." He, therefore, went to the station-house, reported that had the same and asked that means should be taken to prevent evil consequences. He was answered that it was the usual hour for their assembling for work, and that they could not the foot of Broad street. Although it was the hour at which the streets are full of drays and carts hauling cotton and stores from the depots, but one or two were to be seen, and the streets seemed to be descried. On my arrival near the post-office crowds of negroes clongshoremen) were pouring into Broad street shouting "No work to-day." Several stevedores then reported to me that they could get no hands, and work on the whares was stopped. I referred them to the mayor. It was reported to me at the same time that some of the negroes called out as they passed along the streets, "Now is the time to go for them, difficulty by those present in the room; that they ought to be sent away at once, for any fool or knave might at any moment start a riot, which it would be impossible to control. To this last proposition an emphatic assent was given by many in the room.

The mayor then stated that the colored people were afraid to separate; that they were afraid of the whites. I replied that I did not think there would be any danger, but that if that was the fear I would take such measures that I would guarantee their being able to disperse in safety. He replied that I dould not so guarantee their being able to disperse in safety. He replied that I could not so guarantee their being able to disperse in safety. It is a proposed that I could not so guarantee them; but as the question was asked me, and with the evident concurrence of the leaders present, I amswered, because I had no control over the colored people, nor could I appeal to their reason and intelligence under the circumstances; while their leaders there present could, without trouble, send them to their homes. On his again intimating that I should be able to guarantee the whites against the colored people, if I could guarantee the colored people against the whites, I told him the cases were different; that for months these negroes had been taught and firmly believed that if General Hampton was elected governor they would at once be remanded to slavery; that the dispatches now coming in, announcing majorities for Hampton, were to their apprehensions actual sentences into slavery; that their excited fears, however unfounded in truth, were beyond any control, and I would not give any guarantee that I did not feel able to fulfil, especially in so grave a matter as this, in which life and the safety of the city were a stake. The mayor then turned to a person evidently waiting for the purpose, and directed him to telegraph to Governor Chamberlain that the rife clubs were a stake. The mayor then turned to a person evidently waiting for the purpose, and directed him to telegr

Both parties being now armed and fearful of each other, I have held troops in readiness from an early hour. Have ordered Randolph's battery, on its return from Beaufort to-night, to stop here. A conference of the mayor and leading citizens has had no satisfactory results. I will do all I can to suppress riots and save life and property, but I cannot be responsible for results unless I have entire control?

izens has had no satisfactory results. I will do all I can to suppress riots and save life and property, but I cannot be responsible for results unless I have entire control."

Soon after sending this dispatch I received the following from General Ruger: "Information has been sent by the mayor of Charleston to the governor that there is danger of a riot. The governor applies to me. Do whatever is necessary to preserve the peace."

And soon after the following:

"Have ordered Lorain's battery from Blackville to report to you in Charleston. I will send more if you need them."

With these instructions I was on my way to the mayor's office when I met a messenger from him requesting my presence. I found him again in consultation with the same gentlemen with whom he had a conference during the day. After finishing his conversation with them he asked if I had received any orders from General Ruger. I replied in the affirmative and read to him, in the presence of the other gentlemen, the one stating that the governor had applied to General Ruger and directing me to do what was necessary to preserve the peace, was responsible for its preservation, and assumed the duty; that I did not propose to interfere with the functions of the municipal authorities in the discharge of their ordinary duties for the protection of person or property; that I would allow no assemblages on the sidewalks that would obstruct them, or that might cause disturbances whether of whites or blacks; that I would send pairols of troops through the streets night and day, to see that these orders were obeyed; that if any such assemblages refused to obey the police or were too large for them to control, to report the fact to the first patrol that came along, or send word to the citadel, and they would be dispersed by the troops. I added that I would expect all needful information that I should obtain and that would be useful to bim. To all this the mayor immediately and repatedly and emphatically expressed his acquiescence in the measures I proposed to trol for the time being in order I received while was repeated in an order I received while was repeated in an order I received while writing my report to him, as follows:

"Charleston, 7.45 p. M., November 9.

"Telegrams received. I had already seen the mayor and assumed control of the peace of the city. The mayor and myself in perfect accord. The city is all quiet, and the people of all classes dispersing to their homes. I feel confident of maintaining security and quiet, as my measures are approved by all parties. Your telegram, 7.35, just received. It changes nothing of the above. Randolph's battery arrived. I expected Lorain's in the morning. Should I require more will telegraph. I do not think I will require more. Confidence alone was wanting."

From this time until I left Charleston the city remained perfectly quiet. On the morning of the 10th I received orders to proceed to Columbia immediately on the arrival of Colonel Best in Charleston, which order was countermanded the same afternoon. On the 11th, (Saturday,) I received a dispatch from General Hancock, informing me that I was considered as in temporary command of South Carolina during the absence of General Ruger, who had been ordered to Florida, directing me to stop the concentration of such troops at Columbia and Charleston as had not yet commenced the movement, in case their local commanders thought their presence as excessed the movement, in case their local commanding officer at Columbia, as to their distribution; to inform Colonel Black, commanding officer at Columbia, as to their distribution; to inform Colonel Black, commanding officer at Columbia, of this, and communicate it to General Ruger. I took the necessary steps to carry out these instructions.

On this evening, Saturday, 11th, two hours after receiving General Hancock's dispatches, I was informed that reports were being actively circulated among the negroes that I was the real head of the white colus, and that General Huncock's dispatches, I was informed that reports were being acti report to the Secretary of War. I therefore turned over the whole matter to Colonel Best at Charleston, who notified Colonel Black, the next officer in rank in South Carolina, and left the same evening in obedience to my instructions. In the work of these few days I received the active, intelligent assistance of Major Carl Berlin, a citizen of Charleston, formerly on the staff of the artillery of the Army of the Potomac, as my aid. His services in behalf of peace and the security of the citizens were very valuable.

Respectfully submitted.

HENRY I. HUNT, Colonel Fifth Artillery.

Mr. President, as to fraudulent votes, repeating, &c., there was as usual in elections some of this, but not more, in my opinion, by the democrats than by the republicans. If the democrats voted strong in Edgefield the Republicans were not behind them in Beaufort.

Edgefield the Republicans were not behind them in Beaufort.

Here I would call attention to the speech of Mr. Thomas Hamilton, a colored man, a republican, and a member of the house of representatives. This Hamilton is a man of mark. He is a native of South Carolina; was emancipated at the end of the war, and of course poor. He is now a large and successful rice planter, employing a constderable force of laborers. Indeed, it was his colored employes who were so severely whipped by the colored men of the neighboring rice plantations, who struck last spring for higher wages and maltreated the colored laborers who weuld not join them. This was known as the Combahee riots. Hamilton, addressing the house, said:

I am a republican, and there nominated Daniel H. Chamberlain for governor. If Mr. Chamberlain did not get the requisite number of votes it was the fault of those leaders who complained to the colored people that he was a traitor and a democrat. In my opinion, the verdict of the people has been in favored home rule, and against a stranger holding the reins of government in South Carolina any longer. If you talk about fraud you come too near home. If you don't look sharp the democrats will show that there were in the neighborhood of three thousand bogus votes cast in Beaufort County.

Mr. President, I shall also ask to have incorporated in my remarks a letter which I have just received from a prominent colored man in my State. It is proper for me to say that I am personally acquainted with him and know him to be a man of good character and that he enjoys the confidence of the entire community in which he lives, irrespective of party or race. And I have no doubt in my mind that he speaks the sentiments of a large portion of his race in the

Newberry Court-House, South Carolina January 22,

Six: Permit me to occupy a small portion of your valuable time with some suggestions on the state of affairs, past and present, in the State of South Carolina.

You know me to be a colored man, a republican, and, as a member of the house of representatives of the Legislature of this State for four terms, an ardent supporter of republican principles and institutions in all political contests in the State. It is therefore as a colored man and as a republican that I make this appeal to you to make use of your personal and official prominence to set before the leading men of the nation the present unhappy situation of the colored race, and to suggest to them the course which appears to me to promise the solution, and the only solution, of our difficulties.

The two governments which profess to exist in this State negative each other.

of the nation the present unhappy situation of the colored race, and to suggest to them the course which appears to me to promise the solution, and the only solution, of our difficulties.

The two governments which profess to exist in this State negative each other, and leave us without any certain government at all. The wealth and intelligence of the State recognize that of Hampton, as indeed does the majority of the whole people, just as undoubtedly as that majority voted for it. The great uproar made about the acts of fraud and intimidation alleged to have been perpetrated by General Hampton and his followers is without foundation, as far as my knowledge extends. Not being a candidate for office at the recent election, I watched both parties with the closest scrutiny, in order to be able to elect for myself what course to pursue then and thereafter, and in order to assist my own race in that contest and in its consequences. But I saw no fraud, no intimidation practiced by the party of Hampton. On the contrary, the previous majority of the republican party of upward of 1,700 in this county was reduced to one of 565 by the honest, liberal, and fair arguments of democratic speakers and by the kind and frank dealing of the native white citizens. They appealed, not to our fears, but to our intelligence and our consciences. No colored man was threatened or cheated as far as I know, and I know that a fair discussion, a fair vote, and a fair count were the cardinal doctrines of Hampton's campaign. My former political associations made me somewhat slow to appreciate that state of affairs, but, as I did not close my eyes to the event's occurring before me, I could not help seeing it. A change in the republican vote in all the counties of the State equal to that just mentioned as having taken place in this county, would alone kave secured Hampton's election. And that there was an equal change in the other counties, on an average, there is scarcely room to doubt, for this county was a republican and a Champerlain strong

Chamberlain government were to be set up over us as the government of this State, they would refuse to hazard any outlay of money, supplies, or credit; and they could not be blamed for their refusal. But the whites cannot supply us, if they would, out of their own stores. They must have credit in the towns, and the merchant must have credit with dealers out of the State. This credit is not to be had while the deadly upas of the Chamberlain government blights the land with its ruinous taxation, its wasteful expenditures, its dissention-sowing among the people, its utter inability to legislate as our necessities demand, and its contemptible impotence to enforce the laws even so far as to protect the lives of the people. Soldiers may gnard that executive in his office, they may hold the State-house for his self-styled Legislature, they may terrify and silence the public voice, but all the armies of America cannot give hope to a robbed and wretched population or secure it that credit, at home or abroad, which is necessary for subsistence and the conduct or life's business. And this all of us feel. And, on the other hand, we feel that the fair, firm, equal, and humane administration of Hampton would secure every man his rights, would secure the enforcement of the laws as they now stand, would harmonize men of all classes, at least as far as required for the affairs of business, would save great sums of money to the people, would inspire hope and energy at home, would vastly strengthen our credit abroad, and, in fine, would set in active and harmonious operation all the now clogged and grating machinery of this Commonwealth. This, I say, is the sentiment of the colored man as well as of the white man, and, if it could be put to the vote, would be the expression of nine-tenths of our whole people.

I beg that you will exert yourself to present these things properly before our friends at the North. I know that there are incendiaries and office-seekers, who, having no real cencern about us, will scoff at the appeal; but

Hon. T. J. ROBERTSON, United States Senator.

Mr. President, I have always read with great satisfaction the sound constitutional sentiments expressed by General Grant in his special message of January 13, 1875, when he uses the following language:

Any interference by the officers or troops of the United States with the organization of a State Legislature or any of its proceedings, or with any civil department of the Government, is repugnant to our ideas of government.

It is greatly to be regretted that these noble sentiments were disrearded by General Ruger, or those who acted under his authority at the organization of the South Carolina Legislature.

From this disregard we have the sad spectacle of two governors and two houses of representatives in South Carolina, and the official chaos two houses of representatives in South Carolina, and the official chaos which this condition of things necessarily implies.

I consider that General Hampton was fairly elected governor, and I believe that his acknowledgment as such would be for the best interests of the State. He is pledged to protect the colored people in all their rights. This I am satisfied he can and will do. He is a man worthy of entire confidence, prudent, patriotic, and wise. There is something in ancestry. His grandfather was a gallant officer in the war of the Revolution. His father was an aid of General Jackson at the battle of New Orleans. General Hampton himself was a conservative man before the late war. When that broke out, yielding as he understood it to duty, he fought with the greatest courage on numerous battle-fields, and bears upon his person the scars of honorable wounds.

After the war he was one of the first in our State to admit the newly acquired rights of the colored citizens, and urged political co-operation by the whites with them. His counsels were then in advance of public opinion. If he had been listened to then as he is now, the State would I believe have escaped great evils. Now I think he can do more good as the executive of the State than any other man. The democrats have elected their governor and a majority of the house of representatives, and they have accomplished this by adopting as their platform in regard to the colored race the principle of the legal equalplatform in regard to the colored race the principle of the legal equality of the races as promulgated by the republican party. The administration of local affairs has been so bad in South Carolina under republican rule that the transfer of the house and the governorship to the hands of the democrats cannot but be beneficial. The senate to the hands of the democrats cannot but be beneficial. The senate still remains with the republicans, giving them what we may call a veto power.

No one has expressed himself more forcibly on the subject of the republican misgovernment in South Carolina than Governor Chamberlain, who was then struggling nobly but in vain for reform within his own party. So impressed was he with the horrors of misrule which surrounded him, that on December 22, 1875, he said in a publication over his own name:

The civilization of the Puritan and the Cavalier, of the Roundhead and the Huguenot is in peril. Courage, determination, union, victory, must be our watchwords.

I regard Governor Chamberlain as a man of ability and culture. did what was in my power to advance his political interests, and I only separated myself from him when he called in United States troops to sustain the illegal action of the State returning board.

I am satisfied if the matter of the contested governorship is left to the decision of the supreme court of the State, the members of which are republicans and were elected by republicans, the settlement will be peaceful and for the best interests of the State.

The judges of this court have certainly borne themselves in determining the questions brought before them, in a period of great party excitement, with a fairness and impartiality that reflects the highest honor upon them.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

During the speech of Mr. Robertson a message was received from During the speech of Mr. ROBERTSON a message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. Grant, jr., his Secre-tary, who also announced that the President of the United States had this day approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 4) authorizing Captain Temple and Lieutenant-Commander Whiting, of the Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I believe there is on the table a message from the President of the United States. If there is, I ask

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will announce the unfinished business, as is his duty, which is Senate bill No. 984.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no objection to the President's message being read now. We all want to hear it, that bill not losing its

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be the general understanding that the bill is temporarily laid aside for the purpose of having the President's message read. The Chair submits the message.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I follow the example heretofore occasionally permitted of communicating in this mode my approval of the act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, because of my appreciation of the imminent peril to the institutions of the country from which, in my judgment, the act affords a wise and constitutional means of escape.

For the first time in the history of our country, under the Constitution as it now is, a dispute exists with regard to the result of the election of the Chief Magistrate of the mation.

It is sudgested that were the disposition of disputes touching the electoral votes.

For the first time in the history of our country, under the Constitution as it now is, a dispute exists with regard to the result of the election of the Chief Magistrate of the nation.

It is understood that upon the disposition of disputes touching the electoral votes cast at the late election by one or more of the States depends the question whether one or the other of the candidates for the Presidency is to be the lawful Chief Magistrate. The importance of having clearly ascertained by a procedure regulated by law which of the two citizens has been elected and of having the right to this high office recognized and cheerfully agreed in by all the people of the Republic cannot be overestimated, and leads me to express to Congress and to the nation my great satisfaction at the adoption of a measure that affords an orderly means of decision of a gravely exciting question.

While the history of our country in its earlier periods shows that the President of the Senate has counted the votes and declared their standing, our whole history shows that inno instance of doubt or dispute has he exercised the power of deciding, and that the two Houses of Congress have disposed of all such doubts and disputes, although in no instance hitherto have they been such that their decision could essentially have affected the result.

For the first time then Government of the United States is now brought to meet the question as one vital to the result, and this under conditions not the best calculated to produce an agreement or to induce calm feeling in the several branches of the Government or among the people of the country. In a case where as now the result is involved, it is the highest duty of the law-making power to provide in advance a constitutional, orderly, and just method of executing the Constitution in this most interesting and critical of its provisions. The doing so, far from being a compromise of right, is an enforcement of right and an execution of powers conferred by the Constitution on Congress.

I think that this to meet cases which have not been contemplated in the Constitution or laws or the country.

The bill may not be perfect, and its provisions may not be such as would be best applicable to all future occasions; but it is calculated to meet the present condition of the question and of the country.

The country is agitated. It needs and it desires peace and quiet and harmony between all parties and all sections; its industries are arrested, labor unemployed, capital idle, and enterprise paralyzed by reason of the doubt and anxiety attending the uncertainty of a double claim to the Chief Magistracy of the nation. It wants to be assured that the result of the election will be accepted without resistance from the supporters of the disappointed candidate, and that its highest officer shall not hold his place with a questioned title of right. Believing that the bill will secure these ends, I give it my signature.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read: To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith the proceedings of the commission appointed to examine the whole subject of reform and re-organization of the Army of the United States under the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 24, 1876. The commission report that so fully has their time been occupied by other important duties that they are not at this time prepared to submit a plan or make proper recommendations.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4452) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PACIFIC RAILROAD ACTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 984) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph-line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved

July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act.

Mr. MITCHELL Mr. President, the bill under consideration having been reported favorably by so able a committee as the Judiciary Committee of the Senate is conceded by all to be-although we are not apmittee of the Senate is conceded by all to be—although we are not apprised as to whether it has the sanction of more than a bare majority of Senators comprising that committee—it would seem perhaps "boldness even to temerity" on my part to venture the opinion that to pass this measure would be to transcend the plain, well-defined limit of our constitutional power. Yet with the views I entertain as to the nature of the contract made between the Government of the United States and these railroad companies, by virtue of the act of Congress of July 1, 1862, and of July 2, 1864, amendatory thereof, and in view of the total absence of all constitutional power upon the part of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal any existing law so as to affect the of the total absence of all constitutional power upon the part of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal any existing law so as to affect the obligations of a contract or destroy vested rights, I am constrained to dissent in the strongest possible manner, both by my vote and such arguments as I may be able to command, against the passage of this bill. In what I shall say, however, I shall neither attempt to defend nor condemn the action of any of the corporations whose interests are involved in the proposed legislation in reference to the management of their respective roads; nor shall I discuss the question as to whether these corporations or the individual members thereof have or have not amassed princely fortunes in the construction and management of their roads, but shall endeavor to confine myself exclusively to the naked legal question as to our constitutional power to enact this bill into law. And upon a question so grave as this neither a desire to pander to the wishes of vast corporate power upon the one hand nor any morbid unreasoning sentiment of opposition to soulless corporations upon the other must be permitted to have any weight whatever; for in the determination at all times of a grave question of constitutional power neither passion nor prejudice nor favoritism nor ill-will nor political policy should weigh even so much as the dust in the balance. as the dust in the balance.

The nature of a contract made between the Government and a great corporation, and the question of the power of the Government to change that contract in material respects without the consent of fo change that contract in material respects without the consent of such corporation, are propositions that must be determined, as all will concede, by precisely the same rules and upon the same principles as though the party holding such contract were weak and insignificant and powerless.

What then, Mr. President, is the nature of the contract made between the Government and these railroad companies? What were the terms of that contract? By certain acts of Congress passed in order to aid in the construction of a great national highway across the continent, important powers and privileges were conferred upon cercontinent, important powers and privileges were conferred upon cercontinent, important powers and privileges were conterred upon certain railroad companies. These powers involved, among other things, the right of eminent domain; and these privileges included certain valuable grants of public lands and the loan of the Government credit in the way of interest-bearing bonds. This legislation is to be found mainly in the acts of 1862 and 1864, known as the Pacific Railroad acts; and the terms of the contract thus created between the Government and these companies by the accentance mean the part of the ernment and these companies, by the acceptance upon the part of the companies of the terms proposed in the two acts, must be determined principally by a reference to the provisions of the acts themselves.

By these acts taken together it was provided among other things—
First. That after said railroad was completed and until the bonds issued in aid of its construction together with the interest on the same were paid, at least 5 per cent. of the net carnings should be annually applied to their payment; and

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 29, 1877.

Second. That one-half of the compensation for services rendered the Government by such companies should be retained by the Government and applied to the payment of the bonds issued by the government in aid of the construction of said road. These bonds running thirty years, and the interest thereon, is, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the United States rs. The Union Pacific Railroad Company, decided at the October term, 1875, not required to be refunded by the companies until the maturity of the principal of the bonds. Here, then, we have the plain terms of the contract, full, explicit, and, since the decision of the Supreme Court as to the time when the interest matures as to the companies, free, as it seems to me, from all ambiguity. The Government, whether wisely or otherwise it is immaterial to inquire, made its grant of lands, issued its bonds, stipulated for the payment of the annual interest, and conferred upon these companies franchises and powers which, when accepted and acted upon by the companies respectively, became in them vested rights, which no legislation can disturb. Upon the faith of these grants, and in pursuance of these contracts, stock was subscribed, private capital invested, debts with third parties contracted, mortgages executed, and obligations were thus created which cannot be rightfully impaired by any act of legislation under any reserved power to alter, amend, or repeal.

Under this contract thus voluntarily made by the Government with these companies, the only security stipulated for upon the part of the Government, in so far as annual provision for the payment of principal and interest on these bonds was concerned, was the sum of at least 5 per cent. annually of the net earnings after the road was completed, and one-half of the compensation for services rendered the Government. A more liberal provision in the interest of the Government might have been provided for when these contracts were authorized, but in the wisdom of the Congress that enacted these laws this was deemed sufficient. No sinking fund was provided for beyond this, while the licn of the Government as a security for final repayment of principal and interest of bonds was virtually abandoned the Government for what at the time was deemed a sufficient consideration, and subordinated to the prior liens of the individual bonds of these companies.

Such, then, being in brief the contract made between the Government and these roads, we next inquire what are the main provisions of the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, and to what extent, if at all, do they affect this contract, or how far are they authorized by the reserved power to alter, amend, and repeal contained in the original acts? Before proceeding, however, to examine the provisions of this bill. I desire to call vessel attention to the classes in original acts? Before proceeding, however, to examine the provisions of this bill, I desire to call special attention to the clauses in these acts reserving to the Government the right to alter, amend, and repeal, and under which I presume this bill is sought to be justified. The latter clause of section 18 of the act of July 1, 1862, pro-

And the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Here it will be observed that even if the reservation in the body of an act of the right to alter, amend, or repeal the same can either add to or diminish the power of Congress in this respect, (and this I deny and will advert to that hereafter,) still, in this instance, the power to alter, amend, and repeal was, by the express terms of the reservato alter, amend, and repeal was, by the express terms of the reserva-tion itself, restricted in such a manner as to authorize its exercise only for the purpose of effectuating certain purposes, namely, "to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes." And furthermore, that even in altering, amending, or repealing for such purposes Con-gress should have "due regard for the rights of said companies."

Again the twenty-second section of the act of July 2, 1864, pro-

Again, the twenty-second section of the act of July 2, 1864, provides as follows:

That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The bill reported by the Judiciary Committee proposes to change in a most material manner the liabilities of these companies as fixed by the original acts and in these respects. It proposes first to de-termine what shall be considered "net earnings," and, as I contend, upon the highest judicial authority in the land, to thus make these terms mean something different from what the law declared them to mean when the contract was originally made, and hence to increase the amount to be paid annually by the companies to the Government in the shape of 5 per cent. on the "net earnings." Again, this bill provides that the whole of the compensation for services rendered the Government shall be retained by the Government instead of entitling the companies to one-half of this amount annually, as provided in the original contract. And, third, this bill compels these companies, contrary to the terms of the original contract, to pay annually into the Treasury of the United States, as a sinking fund for the redemption at maturity of the principal and interest of the bonds issued by the Government in aid of such roads, a sum which, together with the 5 per cent. on the net earnings and the amount of compensation for services rendered by the Government, shall amount to 25 per cent. annually of the whole net earnings of such roads.

That this bill therefore proposes to make a new contract for these That this bill therefore proposes to make a new contract for these parties essentially radically different from the existing one and coupled with liabilities as to these railroad companies of a grave and onerous character, in addition to those imposed by the terms of the original acts, nobody, I presume, will deny. There can be no room for controversy, it seems to me, so far as this question is concerned. It impairs the obligations of the original contract in divers and important respects. It increases the annual payments to a sinking fund. It fixes the time of the payment of interest at the end of each year, instead of at the maturity of the books twenty-old years become of at the maturity of the bonds, twenty-odd years hence, as provided by the terms of the contract as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the very case under consideration. It invades the rights of individual stockholders who have invested their money on the faith of the original contract. It dwarfs the security of the first bondholders by diminishing the value of the security to which they must look for final payment. It jeopardizes the rights and interferes with the obligations of innumerable persons, both at home and beyond the seas, who have contracted with these companies in divers ways upon the faith of their rights, their credit, their liabilities, and, if you please, their responsibility financially, as fixed by the terms of the original acts. In a word, it impairs the obligations of a contract, the original acts. In a word, it impairs the obligations of a contract, it destroys vested rights; but, what is infinitely worse and even more to be deprecated than all this, it tramples upon the plighted faith of the Government, voluntarily tendered, sacredly pledged, under the solemn sanction of legislative enactment. The simple question, therefore, is fairly and squarely presented: Can Congress do this without the consent of these companies and at the same time not invade the limits of its constitutional power? I submit, with all deference, that it cannot

And, in the first place, I contend that the reservation in an act of And, in the first place, I contend that the reservation in an act of Congress of a power to alter, amend, or repeal the same neither adds to nor diminishes either the right or power of Congress in this respect. In other words, the right of a subsequent Congress to alter, amend, or repeal any act passed by a preceding Congress is unlimited and unrestricted within the limits I shall name and whether it contains an express reservation upon that subject or not. The power of one Congress to bind its successors for all time, by omitting to insert in its legislation a reservation of power to alter, amend, or repeal, is a proposition so grassly preposterous that no one I imagine will conproposition so grossly preposterous that no one, I imagine, will contend for it. The power to repeal within certain limits never dies. No law, except it be a naked legislative grant or one creating a contract only, is irrepealable, saving as to its effect on rights vested or oblionly, is irrepealable, saving as to its effect on rights vested or obligations created under it, nor is any law passed by any legislative body any less liable to be repealed because of the absence in the act itself of an express reservation of power in this respect than is one containing this express reservation. The power of repeal therefore being an inherent, absolute right in Congress, subject only to certain restrictions that I will name in reference to the effect of such alteration, amendment, or repeal, I contend that, even though the reservations in the Pacific Railroad acts were unqualified, (and they are not,) still Congress would have no greater power in the premises than it still, Congress would have no greater power in the premises than it would have were no such reservation in existence. The power, therefore, to alter, amend, or repeal being absolute within the limits I have suggested let us inquire what this power is. Is it a power that enables Congress to sweep from the statute-books of the country any or every law in existence, and with it or them to destroy every vested right and impair every existing obligation that may have legitimately accrued or been contracted in virtue of or in pursuance of such legisaccrued or been contracted in virtue of or in pursuance of such legislation? Most certainly not. Upon the contrary, it is a power that enables one Congress to alter, amend, or repeal any law passed by a preceding Congress, provided always that in such alteration, amendment, or repeal vested rights are not destroyed or the obligations of contracts impaired. In other words, you may alter, amend, or repeal the law under which rights have been vested or contracts have been rested a provided that in deign as you do not destroy vested rights. the law under which rights have been vested or contracts have been created, provided that in doing so you do not destroy vested rights or impair the obligations of these contracts. Any other construction would imply the right to divest a corporation of property legitimately acquired under a law authorizing it to acquire it while such law was in full force and unrepealed. The law may be repealed, altered, or amended; but rights vested, obligations created, are beyond the reach of the law so far as the power of the Legislature is concerned. In this respect the law stands upon precisely the same footing as a power of attorney. Every power of attorney not coupled with an interest may be revoked at the pleasure of the party executing it; but no lawyer will contend that the revocation of a power of attorney could in any manner whatever interfere with property or attorney could in any manner whatever interfere with property or disturb contracts acquired or made in virtue of such power before the revocation.

To hold that it is an incident to every law under which a contract is made, or by which one is made, that it may be changed or repealed may with plausibility be maintained; but to hold that every contract made under a law that is repealable is a condition entering into the contract, and therefore also repealable, would be to contend for a doctrine that would destroy all corporate contracts and affect all corporate property. The law is one thing, the contract made under the law is another. In this case the Pacific Railroad acts might have remained a dead letter upon the statute-books for years had not the terms tendered been accepted and acted upon by the rehad not the terms tendered been accepted and acted upon by the respective companies. Until this was done the law would have been as much in force, as much a law, as it is to-day; but still no contract would have been created, no rights would have vested, no obligations incurred. But when the terms were accepted by the companies a contract from such date only, and not from the date of the act, was created. The contract when made is no part of the law, but an execution of the powers contained in the law. You may repeal the law, but you cannot disturb the contract; nor can you add new or increased liabilities by changing the law in such manner as to change the terms of the contract.

In the Dartmouth College case it was expressly held that the power to alter, amend, or repeal the charter did not carry with it the power to divest rights acquired under the charter. The court held that the charter conferred by this law was a contract between the Legislature and the corporation, and it was only the law under which such contract was made that could be repealed or changed and not the contract itself.

Congress passes a law tendering upon certain conditions to certain Congress passes a law tendering upon certain conditions to certain corporations important privileges, powers, and franchises. These corporations accept the offer, comply with the terms and conditions. Here, then, is a contract with full consideration on both sides. On the one part the Government grants valuable franchises and privileges; on the other, the corporations build a railroad across the continent. The contract is an entirety. It is perfect in all its parts. But it is said the law may be repealed. Grant that it may. Suppose, however, before it is repealed the contract is made by a full acceptance and compliance with its terms, by which property rights have vested and obligations been incurred; will it be contended that there can be such a repeal or modification of the law without the consent of the companies as to destroy the contract or affect property rights under it? Most certainly not.

But we are not-left to grope in the dark upon this subject. The

But we are not left to grope in the dark upon this subject. The But we are not-left to grope in the dark upon this subject. The highest courts in the land have given judicial construction to the power of legislative bodies to alter, amend, or repeal existing laws. And the judicial definition of the power is that legislative bodies may alter, amend, or repeal; provided, however, that in doing so private rights are not divested nor the obligations of contracts impaired; and to some of these decisions I desire to attract attention.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Curran vs.

Arkansas, 15 Howard, 510, say:

We do not consider, therefore, that the power of the State to repeal this charter enables the State to pass a law impairing the obligation of its contracts.

In Holyoke vs. Lyman, 15 Wallace, 519, the Supreme Court say: Vested rights, it is conceded, cannot be destroyed or impaired under such a re-

Again, in Muller vs. The State, 15 Wallace, 498—and by the way this very case is quoted by the committee to sustain their report—the doctrine is laid down in these words:

Power to legislate upon such a reservation in a charter to a private corpora-tion is certainly not without limit, and it may well be admitted that it cannot be exercised to take away or destroy rights acquired by virtue of such charter and which by a legitimate use of the powers granted have become vested in the corpora-

It was held in the highest court of Kentucky in a case reported in 15 Munroe's Law and Equity Reports, 357, as follows:

A reservation by the Legislature in a charter to alter, amend, or repeal does not imply the power to alter or change the vested rights acquired by the corporators under the charter, and to add new parties and managers without the consent of the corporators.

In the case of Mumma vs. Potomac Company, 8 Peters, 286, the court held, in substance and effect, that under the reserved power to "alter, amend, or repeal," Congress, while it may exercise control over the franchise it has granted, cannot divest vested rights, impair the obligation of contracts, or take from the corporators their property without due process of law or without making just compensation. tion.

Chief-Justice Shaw, of Massachusetts, in the case of The Commonwealth vs. Essex Company, 13 Gray, 253, in speaking of the reserved power under the laws of that State, which provided that all acts of incorporated companies were subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal at the pleasure of the Legislature, uses this language:

repeal at the pleasure of the Legislature, uses this language:

It seems to us that this power must have some limit, though it is difficult to define it. Suppose an anthority has been given by law to a railroad corporation to purchase a lot of land for purposes connected with its business, and they purchase such lot from a third party, could the Legislature prohibit the company from holding it! If so, in whom should it vest, or could the Legislature direct it to revest in the grantor or escheat to the public, or how otherwise? Suppose a manufacturing company is authorized to erect a dam and flow a tract of meadow, and the owners claim gross damages, which are assessed and paid, can the Legislature afterward alter the act of incorporation so as to give to such meadow-owners future annual damages? Perhaps from these extreme cases—for extreme cases are allowable to test a legal principle—the rule to be extracted is this: that where, under power in a charter, rights have been acquired and become vested, no amendment or alteration of the charter can take away the property or rights which have become vested under a legitimate exercise of the powers granted.

It is recalled to a contact further anytherities as those already eited.

It is needless to quote further authorities, as those already cited settle beyond controversy the doctrine of the law that Congress, un-der a reserved power to alter, amend, or repeal acts of incorporation, der a reserved power to alter, amend, or repeal acts of incorporation, has no power to divest the corporation of its property or impair the obligation of its contracts. And even should it be conceded that the contract itself between the Government and the railroad companies could be repealed under the reserved power to alter, amend, or repeal, inasmuch as this could not be done without depriving these companies of their property, another provision of the Constitution is encountered and the terms of which must enter into the proceeding and be complied with, namely, that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

It has been held repeatedly by the highest judicial authority that a legislative grant is not revocable.

In the case of Rice vs. Railroad Company, 1 Black, 359, the Supreme Court of the United States used this language:

If Congress pass an act granting public lands to a Territory to aid in making a railroad, and if by the true construction of the act the Territory acquired any beneficial interest in the lands, as contradistinguished from a mere naked trust or power to dispose of them for certain specified uses and purposes, the act is irrepealable, and a subsequent act attempting to repeal it is void.

In the case of Terrett vs. Taylor, 9 Cranch, page 50, it was held a legislative grant was irrevocable.

In the opinion of court delivered in that case by Justice Story, this language occurs:

If the Legislature possessed the authority to make such a grant and confirmation it is very clear to our minds that it vested an indefeasible and irrevocable title. We have no knowledge of any authority or principle which could support the doctring that a legislative grant is revocable in its nature and held only drants bene placits. Such a doctrine would uproot the very foundations of almost all the land titles in Virginia, and is utterly inconsistent with a great and fundamental principle of a republican government: the right of the citizens to the free enjoyment of their property legally acquired.

Again, in the case of McGee vs. Mathias, 4 Wallace, 155, the Suoreme Court of the United States, in giving construction to the Arkansas swamp-land act of 1850, said:

It is not doubted that the grant by the United States to the State upon conditions and the acceptance of the grant by the State constituted a contract. All the elements of a contract met in the transaction: competent parties, proper subject-matter, sufficient consideration, and consent of minds. This contract was binding upon the State, and could not be violated by its legislation without infringement of the Constitution.

But it is said that while the Constitution of the United States pro-But it is said that while the Constitution of the United States provides that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, there is nothing in the Constitution that prohibits Congress from passing such a law. And it has been argued that because the States are prohibited in express terms, therefore by implication Congress has the power. The Constitution, however, it must be borne in mind, creates a government of limited and enumerated powers. What he its corress terms or he preserved implication are not delegated. mind, creates a government of limited and enumerated powers. What by its express terms or by necessary implication are not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. It possesses, therefore, no power which is not expressly conferred or which is not necessary to the execution of one expressly conferred. And I insist there is nothing in the Constitution, either express or implied, that can, by any rule of construction, be tortured into a grant of power to Construction in the objection of construction and construction. gress to impair the obligation of contracts or to destroy vested rights, save and except in one particular instance or class of cases; and the very fact that an express grant of power to legislate in such manner as may interfere with vested rights in one particular class of cases by necessary implication excludes the power in every other class of cases. The Constitution, in section 8, article 1, in enumerating the powers of Congress, says:

The Congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bank-ruptcies throughout the United States.

Here, then, is an express grant empowering Congress in this particular class of cases to pass a law that will affect the obligation of contracts, that will divest vested rights. If, therefore, this great power, so in conflict with the first principles of private and individual right, is in one class of cases expressly given to Congress, is not the inference irresistible and logical that no such power can be exercised in any other case whatever, the more especially when no implied power exists to do such thing in carrying into execution any of the other express powers conferred upon Congress?

Where, then, does Congress obtain the power to pass this bill? In what section or line of the Constitution does it exist? Is it to be found in the general grant to Congress of legislative powers? Most certainly not. The Constitution provides, it is true, that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress," &c.; but when we come to examine the legislative powers that are therein when we come to examine the legislative powers that are therein granted we fail to find anything that would authorize interference with the obligations of a contract or that would justify the invasion of vested rights, save in the particular instance or class of cases to or vested rights, save in the particular instance or class of cases to which I have attracted attention.

But suppose the grant of legislative power had been unlimited, unrestricted, absolute, if you please, in so far as any restriction contained in the Constitution itself is concerned, and the clause had read in this wise: "All legislative powers shall be vested in Congress," instead of "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in Congress;" still I contend that under this sweeping grant of unlimited Congress; "still I contend that under this sweeping grant of unlimited power Congress could not invade the domain of private right by impairing the obligation of contracts or divesting individuals of rights already vested. And why not? I answer, for the sufficient reason that to do so would be to transcend the legitimate powers of legislalation. It would be to step beyond the outer limit of unrestricted legislative power. It would be to depart from the province of legislation and to enter the domain of the judiciary. The passage of a law, therefore, having this effect, even though there were no restrictions in the Constitution on the legislative power vested in Congress by that instrument, would not for the reasons stated be a legitimate exercise of legislative power. A law deciding a controversy between individuals in a case pending in a court of justice wherein a matter of private property was involved would be no greater usurpation of legislative power than the former. The proper, well-defined boundary of the unlimited powers of legislation, if I may so speak, would be transcended in either case. The limitations to legislative power in all legislative bodies are not merely those prescribed by the fundamental law, for, in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The Loan Association vs. Topeka, 20 Wallace, 662:

There are limitations on such power which grow out of the essential nature of all free governments; implied reservations of individual rights, without which she social compact could not exist, and which are respected by all governments entitled to the name. No court, for instance, would hesitate to declare void a statute which enacted that A and B, who were husband and wife, should be so no longer, but that A should thereafter be the husband of C, and B the wife of D, or which should enact that the homestead now owned by A should no longer be his but should henceforth be the property of B.

Again, in the same case, the court uses this language:

Again, in the same case, the court uses this language:

It must be conceded that there are such rights in every free government beyond the control of the state. A government which recognized no such rights, which held the lives, the liberty, and the property of its citizens subject at all times to the absolute despotism and unlimited control of even the most democratic depository of power, is after all but a despotism. It is true it is a despotism of the many, of the majority, if you choose to call it so, but it is none the less a despotism.

* **
The theory of our governments, State and national, is opposed to the deposit of unlimited power anywhere.

Chief-Justice Marshall, in Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch, 103, lays down the law upon this important subject in these words:

Where, then, a law is in its nature a contract, when absolute rights have vested under that contract, a repeal of the law cannot divest those rights, and the act of annulling them, if legitimate, is rendered so by a power applicable to the case of every individual in the community. It may well be doubted whether the nature of society and of government does not prescribe some limits to the legislative power, and, if any be prescribed, where are they to be found, if the property of an individual, fairly and honestly acquired, may be seized without compensation? To the Legislature all legislative power is granted—

And here it will be perceived the court is speaking of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, wherein there was no restriction upon the legislative power—but the question whether the act of transferring the property of an individual to the public be in the nature of a legislative power, is well worthy of serious reflection. It is the peculiar province of the Legislature to prescribe general rules for the government of society; the application of these rules to individuals in society would seem to be the duty of other departments. How far the power of giving the law may involve every other power in cases where the Constitution is silent, never has been and perhaps never can be defaultely stated. The validity of this rescinding act, then, might well be doubted, were Georgia a single, sovereign State.

The supreme court of Vermont, in the case of Briggs vs. Hubbard, said:

Every law that takes away or impairs rights vested agreeably to existing laws is retrospective. To say the least of such laws, they are generally unjust and neither accord with sound legislation nor the fundamental principles of the social compact.

Chancellor Kent, in Gardner vs. Village of Newburgh, 2 Johnson, 161, said:

My conclusion is that, upon principle as well as upon authority, a legislative act, whether it be a positive enactment or a repealing statute, which takes away the vested rights of property of individuals for any purpose (except where property is taken for public use and upon a just compensation) is to be adjudged invalid, as being above the power and beyond the scope of legislative authority.

But not only has the doctrine that Congress has no power to pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts or divesting vested rights been asserted by commentators on the Constitution, but by numerous judicial decisions. Duer on Constitutional Jurisprudence, page 357, uses this language:

A similar restriction with regard to the bills of attainder and ex post facto laws is imposed by the Constitution on Congress as well as upon the State Legislatures, but not with regard to laws impairing the obligation of contracts, which are also retrospective in their operations and equally incensistent with sound legislation and the fundamental principles of the social compact. * * * The power possessed by a State Legislature, to which everything not expressly reserved is granted, and the temptation to abuse that power, render express restrictions, if not absolutely necessary, at least prodent and useful, but the National Legislature has no power to interfere with contracts except when it is expressly given to it. * * * But Congress is expressly invested with this power in regard to bankruptcy as an enumerated and not as an implied power, and in no other form can it impair the obligation of a contract.

Cooley on Constitutional Limitations asserts the same doctrine, while the courts in the following and many other cases have held the same thing. In Kentucky, in the case of Norris vs. Donivan, 4 Metcalf, 355; in Connecticut, in Hubbard vs. Brainerd, 35 Conn., 563; and in Indiana, in Griffln vs. Wilcox, 21 Indiana, 370, where it was held that to deprive a person of a right of action against another by an act of Congress for false imprisonment was unconstitutional, upon the ground that a right of action was property which legislation could not deprive him of.

I contend, therefore, that under no clause of the Constitution can the bill in question be justified, nor yet by any reserved power or stipulation in the acts themselves.

But it is said that because the Pacific Railroad act says that at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings shall be paid annually to the Government, therefore Congress has the right not only to construe the contract as to what is the meaning of the term "net earnings," but also to compel the companies to pay to the Government annually any amount it may deem proper over 5 per cent. of the net earnings as thus defined by one party to the contract. That Congress has the power to do either the one or the other, I deny. And, first, as to its right to declare the meaning of the term "net earnings."

When the Government contracts with one or more of its citizens it,

When the Government contracts with one or more of its citizens it, in so far as relates to the construction and interpretation of the terms and conditions of the contract, is divested of its sovereignty, and stands precisely in the same position as a private individual, with no greater and no less powers in this respect. It stands on a perfect equality with the person with whom it is contracting, and has no more power to construe or interpret the contract for itself, if this construction or interpretation be doubtful, than has the other party to the contract to construe or interpret it for itself. If the term "net earnings" as applied to railroads had, at the time this contract was made, a definitive meaning in law, then neither the Government nor the corporation has the right to change that meaning without the consent of the other. If, upon the other hand, the meaning of the term was uncertain and indeterminate in law and in fact at the time the contract was made, then neither party to the contract can determine such meaning to be one thing or the other in the absence of assent or acquiescence from the other, but in that event the judicial tribunals are the only common arbiter.

But, again, is it not a fact that the meaning of the term "net earnings" did have a definitive meaning in law at the time this contract was entered into between the Government and these corporations? And is it not, furthermore, a fact that the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee changes that meaning to the detriment of these companies and without their consent, and thus impairs the obligation of their contract and interferes with their vested rights?

The first section of the bill, say the committee in their report in its favor, "defines what shall be considered net earnings of said railroad companies respectively," thus assuming that the term had no well-understood meaning when used in the original contract, and then assuming, furthermore, that the Government alone has the right to adjudicate upon the subject and give to these words construction and definition. And then in the clause in the pending bill determining in the language of the committee "what shall be considered net earnings," all sums owing or paid by said companies as interest on any portion of their indebtedness are excluded from consideration; which is in direct conflict with the only case of which I have any knowledge wherein this precise question upon a similar provision was decided by the highest court in the land. In the case of St. John vs. Eric Railway Company, 22 Wall., 137, which was a case wherein St. John, who was a holder of preferred stock in the Eric Railway Company and as such entitled to a dividend from the net earnings of the road, sought to compel the company to pay him his dividend out of the net earnings, exclusive of the payment by the company of interest upon its indebtednes or rents of leased roads, the court said:

We are of the opinion that the rents for that year, accruing under leases taken by the company after the issuing of the preferred stock, and the interest upon the sterling bonds for that year were properly paid, and that there were no net earnings earned in that year which could be properly applied in payment of preferred dividends. These views are fatal to the complainant's case.

Can Congress, therefore, in the face of this decision defining the meaning of the term "net earnings" of a railroad company to be only such earnings as remain after deducting from the gross earnings not only all operating and other necessary expenses but also the interest which has been paid by the company during the year in maintaining its corporate existence and carrying forward its business, find warrant for legislating that said term shall be "construed" to be something else? It seems to me not. The companies have paid and are paying annually from the earnings of the road, as it is alleged, interest on the first-mortgage bonds. To the extent of 5 per cent. annually upon this amount of interest this bill proposes the company shall pay to the Government, when the contract under the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case just quoted only called for 5 per cent. on the net earnings excluding this interest. To this extent, therefore, this bill proposes to wrest from these companies, without due process of law, without making any compensation, much less just compensation, as the Constitution requires, their money and their property.

But what was the purpose in the act of 1862 of the two little words "at least" inserted immediately preceding the words "5 per cent."—
"at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings?" Was the object of these words to reserve to the Government the unlimited power at any time, without the consent of such corporations, to increase this amount to 10, 20, 30, or 50 per cent. per aunum? Or was it not rather a provision inserted for the benefit of the debtor; a discretionary power granted to the corporations to pay annually toward the liquidation of their indebtedness as much more over and above the 5 per cent. as their ability or desire might dictate or prompt? It seems to me the latter is the only reasonable and fair construction that can be applied. The language of the contract in effect is this: You must pay at least 5 per cent. annually on your net earnings; you may pay as much more as you see proper. Suppose I borrow $5,000 from Senator Thurman for five years, with the understanding and agreement that I shall pay it back to him in installments of at least $1,000 per annum, and I execute my note accordingly. Could it be successfully contended that the party holding the note could, at his pleasure and without my consent, compel me to pay $2,000 per annum or any other sum over and above $1,000 per annum? Most clearly not. The words "at least" are for my benefit and not for the benefit of my creditor. I must pay the $1,000 per annum, I may pay more at my option. And so here in this Pacific Railroad act; the words cannot enable the Government to compel the payment of more words cannot enable the Government to compel the payment of more than the 5 per cent. per annum without the consent of the debtor party. Such a construction would be foreign to all reason, in conflict with all judicial decisions, and wholly destructive of private rights. And upon this point I call the attention of the Senate to the case of the Common wealth rs. Proprietors New Bedford Bridge in Massachusetts, 2 Gray, 339. In that case the Legislature of Massachusetts incorporated the defendants for the purpose of building a bridge over a certain river in that State. The act provided that the bridge should have two suitable draws which should be at least thirty feet wide. Subsequently the Legislature amended the law, requiring the draw to be not less than sixty feet wide. The corporation resisted this as an invasion of their rights under the original contract, and rested their case upon the unconstitutionality of the act changing the width of the draw. The court sustained the position taken by the corporation, and the opinion of the court, in part, is as follows:

the draw. The court sustained the position taken by the corporation, and the opinion of the court, in part, is as follows:

The Commonwealth and the defendants are but parties to a contract. Each has equal rights and privileges under it, and neither can interpret its terms authoritatively, so as to control and bind the rights of the other. The Commonwealth has no more power or authority to construe the charter than the corporation. By becoming a party to a contract with its citizens, the government divests itself of its sovereignty in respect of the terms and conditions of the contract and its construction and interpretation, and stands in the same position as a private individual. If it were otherwise, the rights of parties contracting with the Government would be held at the caprice of the sovereign, and exposed to all the risks arising from the corrupt or ill-judged use of misguided power. The interpretation and construction of contracts, when drawn in question between the parties, belongs exclusively to the judicial department of the government. The Legislature has no more power to construct heir own contracts with their citizens than those which individuals make with each other. They can do neither without exercising judicial powers, which would be contrary to the elementary principles of our government. * * If the Legislature have the power to decide upon the true meaning of the terms of the contract, and to determine what shall be deemed suitable in the construction of the bridge and draws, there can be no limit placed on the exercise of this power.

And furthermore in the same case the court proceeding say:

And furthermore in the same case the court proceeding say:

If they have the right to prescribe a draw of sixty feet in width, they may hereafter require the defendants to extend it to one hundred feet or to build it across entire space between the shore and the adjacent island.

That Congress would have the power to declare a forfeiture of said That Congress would have the power to declare a foresture of said railroads or legislate for the purpose of keeping the same "in repair and use," and in such latter event to direct the income of such com-panies to be devoted to the use of the United States to repay all such expenditures caused by the default and neglect of such companies, or any of them, whenever there has been a failure to comply with the any of them, whenever there has been a failure to comply with the terms of the charter, no one will pretend to deny. But the theory of the bill presented by the Judiciary Committee does not proceed upon the assumption that there has been any such failure upon the part of these corporations or any of them. It is not pretended that the road was not completed within the time fixed by law, nor could it be, for, as a matter of history, that speaks volumes for American enterprise and which most assuredly is not to the discredit of these companies; this great continental highway was in running order before one-half the time had expired within which the act of Congress required it to be done. July 1, 1876, was the limit prescribed whereas the road was July 1, 1876, was the limit prescribed, whereas the road was be done. July I, 1876, was the limit prescribed, whereas the road was in running order, if not permanently completed and accepted, according to the terms of the charter, in April, 1869. Nor is it pretended that there has been any failure to keep said road "in repair and use," or that they have permitted it to remain "out of repair and unfit for use," which, under the express terms of section 17 of the act of 1862, would authorize legislation of a character different from that now authorized; nor can it be said that the contingency provided for in section 18 of the original act has happened, wherein Congress is authorized to "add to, alter, amend, or repeal the act" in certain respects and for certain purposes. But in what respects and for what nurposes? I answer in the plain language of the act itself: purposes? I answer in the plain language of the act itself :

To promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

Can it, I ask, be successfully maintained as a legal proposition that so long as these companies keep this road in good working order, so so long as these companies keep this road in good working order, so long as it remains as is it is now, one of the very best conditioned and most carefully operated roads on the continent, so long as the Government in peace as well as in war has the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes secured to it by the terms of its own charter—can it, I repeat, so long as these things continue to exist, be successfully maintained as a legal proposition that under or in virtue of the provisions of section 18 of the act of 1862 Congress canally be converged. Congress could, by any mere assumption upon its part that the "pecuniary condition" of these roads is not such as it might or should be, entertain jurisdiction to pass this bill on the ground that the be, entertain jurisdiction to pass this bill on the ground that the contingency had happened that authorizes Congress to "add to, alter, amend, or repeal the act" for the purpose of promoting the public interest, keeping the same in working order, and securing to the Government the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes? To give to this section such a construction, it seems to me, would be to do violence to language and every recognized rule of legal interpretation. But yet the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] who presents the report in this case asserts the startling proposition that the "pecuniary condition" of these companies, unajudicated and undetermined by any competent tribunal, assumed, if you please, by the legislative mind to be in a certain state, upon such evidence only as appears from the official reports of the companies themselves, and such state of pecuniary condition to be only the legitthemselves, and such state of pecuniary condition to be only the legitimate and inevitable result, in so far as relates to the present condition of the accounts between the Government and these companies, of the voluntary preferences given these companies by the Government when it subordinated its right to a first lien as security for the payment of its own bonds to that of the bondholders of the companies; and when instead of providing for the payment by the companies of annual interest it stipulated that such interest should not be paid until the maturity of the bonds.

At this point, without concluding, the Senator yielded to Mr. Wadleigh, on whose motion the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fourteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 29, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

NATIONAL METROPOLITAN LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. HANCOCK, (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4553) to incorporate the National Metropolitan Life-Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the States that have not been called will be called for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to calling the States that have not yet been called for the introduction of bills and resolutions?

Mr. KASSON. Is this the day for the District of Columbia business at two o'clock?

The SPEAKER. It is.
Mr. KASSON. If they will not call for their time I am perfectly willing to agree to the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota.
The SPEAKER. The Chair has no power to make any such condi-

Mr. KASSON. The chairman of the District of Columbia Committee is here and he can say. If that committee shall demand their time at two o'clock I wish to say there are some motions which should be acted on this morning. I therefore object to the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM COLORADO.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the motion to suspend the rules coming over from last Monday made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] and pass the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, seating Mr. Belford as a member-elect from the State of Colorado.

Mr. KASSON. I may be able to withdraw my motion without objection. I understand the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. Knorr] said on Saturday that the subject-matter of my resolution would be called up to-morrow. Am I correct?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Knorr,] chairman of the committee on the Judiciary, gave notice on Saturday be would call up the resolution reported from his committee on that subject to-morrow

Mr. KASSON. In that case then I withdraw the motion to suspend the rules made by me and which comes over from Monday last.

JAMES B. EADS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask, by unanimous consent, the House resume and Mr. HOLMAN. I ask, by unanimous consent, the House resume and complete the consideration of the bill pending at the adjournment on Saturday, making appropriation to pay Captain Eads certain moneys under his contract to open the mouth of the Mississippi River.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to offer a resolution for reference, calling on the Secretary of War for information.

Several members demanded the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4540) to provide for the payment of James B. Eads for the construction of jetties, and other auxiliary works, to make wide and deep the channel between the South Pass of the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico, under contract with the United States, reported from the Committee on Appropriations by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman.] The pending question is on the substitute moved by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to deliver to said James B. Eads, or his assigns or legal representatives, the sum of $500,000 in bonds of the United States, as provided for by an act entitled "An act making provision for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes." approved March 3, 1875, the Secretary of War having determined that said sum is due to said Eads by the terms of a certain written contract entered into by said Eals with the United States under and by the provisions of said act of March 3, 1875.

Mr. STONE. Is this before the House by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is.
Mr. STONE. Then I object.
Mr. CLYMER. The gentlem

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman's objection comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked for objection, and none was made at the time, and, the consideration of the subject having been proceeded with, objection now comes too late.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be read as reported from the committee.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $500,000 to James B. Eads, of Saint Louis, or his assigns or legal representatives, the Secretary of War having determined that that amount is due to said Eads by the terms of a certain written contract entered into by said Eads with the United States to construct such permanent and sufficient jetties and such auxiliary works as may be necessary to create a wide and deep channel between the South Pass of the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico, to be naid under and in pursuance of the provisions of the act approved paid under and in pursuance of the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1875, making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of public works on rivers and harbors, and for other

The SPEAKER. At the adjournment on Saturday the House divided by tellers on the substitute and no quorum appeared. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will resume their places.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 93.

Mr. BUCKNER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and decided in the negative-yeas 58, nays 162, not voting 70; as follows:

During the call of the roll,
Mr. ASHE said: My colleague from North Carolina, Mr. Yeates, is confined to his room by sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.
The SPEAKER. The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the original bill.
Mr. O'BRIEN. Let it be read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order, the previous question having been ordered on the substitute and engrossed bill.

Mr. CONGER. I move to reconsider the motion by which the main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been only partially executed the gentleman is not in order in making that motion.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that he wait until the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Very well.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the previous question on the passage of the bill if the operation of the previous question is exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, being recognized, has the right to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the has the right to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to state that my object in making that motion is that I may ask the House to adopt an amendment to the bill.

ADMISSIONS ON THE FLOOR.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask that Rule 134 may be read and enforced. We cannot pass this morning outside the seats without running against four or five lobbyists.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky demands the reading of the one hundred and thirty-fourth rule.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I hope it will be enforced.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will enforce it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as 1010ws:

134. No person except members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, the President's Private Secretary, foreign ministers, the governor for the time being of any State, Senators and Representatives elect, judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, and such persons as have by name received the thanks of Congress—March 15, 1867—shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives—March 19, 1860—or any of the rooms upon the same floor or leading into the same—March 2, 1865; provided that ex-members of Congress who are not interested in any claim pending before Congress, and shall so register themselves may also be admitted within the Hall of the House; and no persons except those herein specified shall at any time be admitted to the floor of the House.—March 15, 1867.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs that the officers of the House enforce the rule as read.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to make the point of order that no persons other than those named in the rule can be introduced to the floor of the House, even under the direction of the Speaker, except by a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels that he has been trying his very best to enforce the rule; and he asks now that members, without exception, will co-operate with him in doing so in the future.

PAYMENT OF JAMES B. EADS.

I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. That motion is not debatable. The gentleman from Indiana moves to lay the motion to reconsider on the

Mr. CONGER. Does the Chair decide that the motion to reconsider is not debatable?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course it is not debatable—the previous question still operating.

Mr. CONGER. The operation of the previous question is exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read from the Digest:

A motion to reconsider is not debatable if the question proposed to be reco-sidered is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. But in this case the question was evidently debat-

The SPEAKER. The previous question was operating on the motion for the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. But it had exhausted itself in the third reading. The previous question was exhausted when the bill was ordered to a third reading

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the statement in the Digest:

A motion to reconsider is not debatable if the question proposed to be reconsidered was not debatable.—Journals, 2, 27, page 331; 2, 30, pages 135, 136. But the fact of a question kaving been decided under the operation of the previous question does not prevent debate on the motion to reconsider, if the original question was otherwise debatable.—Journal, 1, 33, page 127.

Mr. CONGER. That is what I supposed.
Mr. BANKS. The motion to order the bill to a third reading was debatable, and of course the motion to reconsider the vote ordering it to a third reading is also debatable.

Mr. SAMPSON. I remember very distinctly that this question was up during the last session; and the Speaker pro tempore who occupied the chair at that time decided in the first instance that this motion the chair at that time decided in the first instance that this motion was not debatable; but after a long discussion upon the floor of the House it was decided to be debatable; that the previous question was exhausted; that the main question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, and the previous question being ordered on that, when that vote was taken the operation of the previous question was exhausted. I remember that the discussion on that occasion occupied about half an hour.

vious question was exhausted. I remember that the discussion on the point of order on that occasion occupied about half an hour.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There are certain questions which under the rules of the House are not debatable, and motions to reconsider them are not debatable. A bill or resolution is debatable on engrossment, and a motion to reconsider that question is debatable; a motion to adjourn and a motion for the previous question are not debatable, and motions to reconsider them are not debatable. I think the Chair will see that this is the only stage where a bill is properly debatable. Although our rules permit bills on their passage to be debated, yet I think a motion to reconsider at this stage of a bill be debated, yet I think a motion to reconsider at this stage of a bill in order to bring it back for amendment should be supported by debate. If there should be debate at any stage of a bill there is reason why it should be debated at this stage. I think if the Chair will reflect he will see that this question is properly debatable, and therefore a motion to reconsider after the previous question is exhausted is debatable. If the gentleman in charge had asked the previous question on the passage the motion to reconsider would not have been debatable, but he did not insist upon his right to move the previous question. It is customary for a member in charge of a bill to move to reconsider and table at each stage, which shuts out those opposing the bill from getting the floor if the House supports the member in charge. In this case this was not done, and the privilege I think good to reconsider now.

I think good to reconsider now.

Mr. KASSON. I did not hear my colleague distinctly and do not know if he referred to the statement in the Digest on page 199. The construction put upon the rule will be found there; and with the permission of the Chair I will read it:

Where a vote taken under the operation of the previous question is reconsidered, the question is then divested of the previous question, and is open to debate and amendment.—Journals, 1, 27, page 129; 1, 33, page 127.

Then comes this note in brackets:

These decisions apply only to cases where the previous question was fully exhausted by votes taken on all the questions covered by it before the motion to reconsider was made. In any other case, the pendency of the previous question would preclude debate.

Therefore, as I construe the ruling, this bill has been fully divested of the operation of the previous question, and my recollection of the decisions of the Chair heretofore has been that the motion to recon sider could only be avoided by the person in charge of the bill immediately calling the previous question on the passage of the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Chair recognizes the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, [Mr. Buckner,] to-day being devoted to the business of that committee.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair recognize me when this question comes up again?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do so, and in the mean time the Chair will examine this question more fully.

WASHINGTON CITY AND ATLANTIC COAST RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. BUCKNER. When the House had last under consideration the business of the District of Columbia there was pending a bill as unfinished business which my colleague on the committee, Mr. HENKLE, has charge of.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1860) to incorporate the Washington City and Atlantic Coast Railroad Com-

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That C. C. Cox, A. A. Gangewer, M. Meigs, Allan Rutherford, J. A. Lynch, W. F. Sliney, C. D. Sloan, G. W. C. Waite, together with such persons as may become associated with them for that purpose, together with their successors, are hereby created and effected into a body corporate and politic, in deed and in law, by the name and title of the Washington City and Atlantic Coast Railroad Company, and by that name have perpetual succession, and may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and be defended, in the courts of law and equity within the District of Columbia, and may use a common seal, and adopt by-laws for the regulation of its government.

which was not accepted by the committee because it was not thoroughly understood. Upon a more thorough understanding of the import of the amendment the friends of the bill were willing to consent that it should become a part of the bill, and I will now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] to offer that amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. I offer the following amendment to come in as an additional section:

That the company receiving the benefits of this grant shall not charge for transporting persons or merchandise more for a less than for a greater distance, nor discriminate against shippers from the same point on their line to any other point on their line or to points on other lines of railroad.

Mr. HENKLE. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENKLE. I now move the previous question on the bill as amended.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time,

Mr. HENKLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, annonneed that the Senate had passed a resolution, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House, to print extra copies of the report of the board of health of the District of Columbia for the year 1876.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which they asked the concurrence of the

A bill (S. No. 1185) to ratify an agreement with certain bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians; also with the Northern Arapahoe and Cheyenne Indians; and

DESTITUTE POOR OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEVENSON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 4473) for the relief of the destitute poor of the District of Co-

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $20,000, for the relief of the destitute poor in the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated; the same to be drawn by warrants of the commissioners of the District of Columbia on the Treasurer of the United States, in such weekly installments as shall be necessary to relieve the distress of those in absolute want.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of ascertaining the amount thus necessary to be drawn for each weekly installment, the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall require the relief commissioners of the District to furnish them the list of such families, and the number of persons in each, who are eligible and require relief from this fund. The said list shall constitute the voucher of the commissioners for the amount to be drawn by their warrant on the Treasurer of the United States.

SEC. 3. That all persons or relief associations claiming assistance from the fund shall make their application to the relief commissioners of the District, who shall keep an alphabetical list of all such applications, and shall determine upon the eligibility of the applicants, and shall submit the same to the commissioners of the District of Columbia as vouchers for their warrant upon the Treasurer of the United States, in accordance with sections 1 and 2 of this act.

SEC. 4. That no part of this appropriation shall be used for any other purpose, nor paid out in any other manner, than for the purpose and in the manner prescribed by the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That the parties hereinbefore named, to whom the distribution of he said fund is intrusted, shall make a report to Congress on the first Monday in December next of their action in relation to the expenditure of the fund hereby appropriated.

Mr. STEVENSON. This bill appropriates the sum of $20,

Mr. STEVENSON. This bill appropriates the sum of $20,000 out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of relieving the wants of the poor and distressed in this District. This amount is to be drawn by warrants of the commissioners of the District of Columbia on the treasurer in weekly installments in such amounts as shall be necessary to relieve those who are actually in want.

I think this bill is sufficiently guarded in its provisions to secure this amount of money being appropriated to those who absolutely need it, and I can say to gentlemen of the House that from representations made to members of the Committee for the District of sentations made to members of the Committee for the District of Columbia there is in this city actual want, and that it is absolutely necessary that we should pass this bill. I think the amount appropriated is perhaps large enough, at least to meet the present necessities of this time. I yield now for a moment to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] who introduced the bill.

Mr. SINGLETON. As the introducer of this bill I wish to make a remark or two in reference to it. I am satisfied from my own observation, and from information derived from various quarters, that there is a vast amount of suffering in this District, absolute human suf-is a vast amount of suffering in this District, absolute human suffering. I have had indigent persons come to my room at twelve o'clock at night and ask for a pittance to buy coal to keep themselves and children from freezing to death, and although I am not one of those who believe in bringing together in this city a large mass of people to live upon the Government—indeed I have always been opposed to it—yet these people are here, they are our fellow-beings and are in suffering circumstances, and there is no time now to inquire whether they be worthy of this pittance of charity which we propose to give them. I hope that not one single member of Congress will vote against the bill. Let us show that while we spend vast amounts of public money in other quarters, we are willing to provide for those persons in this District who are in want and suffering.

I ask the Clerk now to read a portion of a letter which I have received from the committee appointed by the commissioners of this

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

We are now in daily receipt of from three hundred to five hundred applications. The five visitors are at work from daylight till dark and yet are considerably behind. We have but one clerk, but will soon be obliged to have another as he is not able to fill all the orders, keep up his index, and hear the stories of suffering that the poor creatures are too ready to pour into his ears.

We discourage personal applications, but we have a hundred or more every day. Our funds are entirely exhausted and the commission is working upon the faith that Congress will come to the relief. Volumes could be filled with the tales of destitution and distress that constantly greet our ears.

No member of the commission receives any compensation. We pay our clerk $40 per month. He works from ten to fourteen hours a day. We pay our visitors $1 per day.

Our orders are about five dollars' worth to each individual, in coal, wood, flour, corn-meal, rice, sugar, tea, &c., as the case requires.

Very hastily, but most respectfully, submitted.

This memorial humbly sheweth—

1. That at a meeting of citizens of the first ward in the city of Washington, held, in pursuance of a call published in the daily papers, at Wilson's Hall on the 2 id day of February, A. D. 1877, to consider the condition of the poor of the first ward, after action had to enlist the citizens of said ward in immediate measures of relief, the undersigned were appointed a committee to memorialize your honorable body in favor of the speedy passage of an appropriation bill for the relief of the poor of the District of Columbia.

2. That your memorialists respectfully represent to your honorable body that from their own knowledge as pastors of churches in the said ward, and from common report, they can testify that there has not been a winter for many years past when there has been so much suffering and misery, not only among the laboring classes, but among people who have never known pennry until now.

3. That this state of things has arisen out of the general depression of business, the cessation of public works, and the recent numerous discharges of clerks and other employes from the Departments, and that all these causes have been aggravated by the unusual severity of the winter.

4. That there is the most urgent necessity that whatever is to be done in the premises shall be done quickly, because of the fact that the treasuries of the various charitable societies of the first ward, and throughout the city, and also the public funds applicable to the relief of the poor, are exhausted, while there yet remain at least two months of hard weather and scanty employment.

5. That the vast majority of the sufferers at this time is made up of the colored people, who have been drawn to this District as to their Mecca; of citizens of the States and Territories, who have come hither upon real or imaginary business with the Government, who claim residence elsewhere but cannot get away to their homes. WASHINGTON, D.C., January, 21, 1877.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I dislike to appear ungracious by opposing even for a moment this bill reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia. But the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Singleton] has invoked the unanimous support of this House for the bill under consideration. A cursory examination of the bill has satisfied me that it is wrong in principle and is inexpedient. As embodying the reasons why this bill should not pass I will ask to have read in the hearing of the House a portion of the report of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, an extract from the report of the assistant attorney of the District. port of the assistant attorney of the District.

I would ask when it came to pass that the American Government became an eleemosynary institution? I would like to have the Com-mittee for the District of Columbia tell me what more pressing reason there is for an appropriation of $20,000 in the interest of the poor of this District than of the poor of any State or of any other community in the Union.

in the Union.

We have had enough of this sort of charity. It has not been more than twelve months since Congress made large appropriations for the indigent poor or the sufferers of certain overflowed districts of this country. The large amounts thus appropriated were used, not for charity, but for political purposes. I do not apprehend that this appropriation will be used for political purposes, but it will result in an absolute injury to the District of Columbia. It will invite a pauper population to come within the limits of the city of Washington. Wherever an appropriation is made for purposes of charity you will find that those who are not disposed to work, the lazy, the improvident, will flock to that point in order to become the beneficiaries of the appropriation. I regard this bill as a premium upon vagrancy. I apprehend that you now have here a population sufficiently large to tax to the utmost the benevolence and the charities of the good people of this District.

I now ask the Clerk to read the portions I have marked in the re-We have had enough of this sort of charity. It has not been more

I now ask the Clerk to read the portions I have marked in the report of the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Among the most embarrassing questions referred to the assistant attorney have been those growing out of applications to the commissioners for charity. It has been supposed by some that your honorable board had the power to pension worthy applicants out of the public funds; by others, that you could make large donations from the revenues to charitable societies: and, by others, that you could, without law, enter upon a general system of out-door relief, appointing committees of citizens for that purpose.

The whole subject will doubtless receive from Congress the attention it merits; and the relief of the helpless indigent will be lifted by legislation out of the domain of the doubtful doctrine of the inherent powers of a municipal corporation.

Several causes have contributed to the large increase of the numbers of the poor at the national capital. The large annual sums distributed by Congress in alms; the abundant benefactions of churches and relief societies; the liberal contributions of theatrical managers and concert-givers; the extraordinary number and liberality of our charitable institutions; the large number of laborers attracted by the extensive improvements formerly prosecuted by the board of public works, and now left without work; the natural tendency of the newly-emancipated to seek shelter and protection at the seat of Government; the impoverishment of many who visit the capital in some desperate chance of office or lobby success; and the selfish thrusting upon us by counties in neighboring States of their superannated, helpless, and insane indigent, all these causes have swelled the pauper class in the District to a number too large for adequate relief out of the slender treasury of the District. It may well be doubted whether the policy that masses this class of population at the nation's capital is a wise one.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. Now, if the district attorney be

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. Now, if the district attorney be right when he declares that the active benevolence of the good people of this District has invited large numbers of paupers outside to come within the pales of the city, will not that number be greatly increased by the munificence of this Government? Every dollar appropriated by the Government for the pauper inhabitants of this District is but an invitation which will soon spread far and wide, inducing paupers, vagabonds, and every one else who desires a support without work to come to the seat of Government to receive this much-coveted assistance.

without work to come to the seat of Government to receive this much-coveted assistance.

Another reason why this appropriation should not be passed, if it be true that this invitation will induce vagrants to flock to the capital city, is that the result will be an increase of a thriftless population and a corresponding increase of crime. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that at this time, with this very population invited here by the active benevolence of the citizens of this District, there are more cases reported before the police court of the District than in any other court of like kind in the land. I find on page 505 of the report of the attorney that the number of municipal cases disposed of in the police court, with the fines and forfeitures for the respective years ending November 15, 1875, and November 15, 1876, are as follows: number of cases in 1876, 5,088; number of convictions, 4,584. These cases and these convictions largely come from the very character of population invited by this bill. I find further on in the same report that the municipal cases, supplemented by the cases from the United States court for misdemeanor, amount to 8,581. I hazard nothing in saying that the police records in no city in the world will present such a spectacle as you have here from the very population that you propose to benefit by this bill. If I were satisfied that it would reach worthy objects, and worthy objects alone, I should unhesitatingly cease all opposition to the passage of the bill, notwithstanding my conviction that it is wrong on principle.

But, sir, what guarantee have we, what provision in this bill insures that there will be a proper distribution of this fund? Reports

But, sir, what guarantee have we, what provision in this bill insures that there will be a proper distribution of this fund? Reports are to be made by certain parties to the commissioners of the District; are to be made by certain parties to the commissioners of the District; warrants are to be drawn by them, but what officer under bond for the faithful discharge of any duty is to issue one dollar of this money to the poor? Does it go into the hands of charitable institutions? The officers of those institutions are unbonded, and they will disburse the funds at their own pleasure. Hence, if this bill is to pass, I beg the gentlemen having it in charge to allow it to be so amended that the money shall be disbursed by the commissioners of the District of Columbia or some other officers who are under bond.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to my friend from

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to my friend from Alabama [Mr. Caldwell] that he need have no apprehension that any portion of this money will be used as was money appropriated for the suffering poor in his own State, for political purposes. This money is to be appropriated for the relief of those who are in absolute want. As has been shown beyond all question by statements made to members of the committee and to many other gentlemen on this floor, there in this city hundreds of cases of actual starvation.

Upon the question raised by the gentleman from Alabama, as to how this money will be used, I think the bill is sufficiently guarded in that respect. It provides that this money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the United States upon warrants of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, who are officers under bond and under oath. Alphabetical lists are to be kept of the families who are in want and who need this relief in order to sustain life; and the board of commissioners, when satisfied that there is necessity, draw their warrants upon the Treasury of the United States, and this money is then distrib-

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Caldwell] has suggested that an appropriation of this amount will be a premium upon crime. I am at a loss to know how it can increase crime to feed the starving; whether they are criminals or whatever may be their position or condition in life. It seems to me that if the doctrine of the gentleman is carried out and these men are required either to starve or to steal, they will in reality become criminals; whereas if the Government of the United States should appropriate this small pittance for the purpose of relieving their distresses, of tiding them over the winter, they may possibly be preserved from crime as well as from starvation.

In recommending this bill, Mr. Speaker, the committee have not stopped to consider the character or previous condition in life of those who will be benefited by it. Many of them may be bad people; many of them, no doubt, are indolent; some of them, doubtless, are criminals or persons of bad character. Possibly such is the fact. Many of them are unfortunate people of color, who in large numbers have congregated in this city. I base this appropriation, Mr. Speaker, solely upon the ground that those whom it is intended to benefit are in actual want, that they are starving, and their condition appeals to our common humanity.

The gentleman from Alabama should bear in mind the fact that in

The gentleman from Alabama should bear in mind the fact that in his own city, in perhaps every city or municipality in these United States, appropriations are made for the relief of the poor—to prevent starvation, to prevent suffering. The city of Washington has no government. The District of Columbia has no city government. Here there is neither district nor municipal government. It is completely and exclusively in the hands of Congress; and unless this appropriation of the control of the contro ation or one of similar kind be made by Congress, these poor unfortunate people will be compelled to depend upon private charity or starve.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.
Mr. STEVENSON. I yield for the question.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman has stated, very properly, that Congress is the government of this District. I concur with him in reference to the apparent necessity of this measure; I do not question that; but as I understand the provisions of the bill the property of this District is not at all chargeable with this expense. In the police of the District, in the care of its health, in all municipal matters, it is supposed and rightly supposed that the District should pay its pro rata portion of such expenditure. Now in this matter of charity (which may be but the beginning, which may be a precedent for other appropriations of the same kind) I ask the gentleman whether it will not exercise a wholesome influence to provide that a portion of this tax shall rest upon the property-holders of this District, so that, instead of having a unanimous disposition to besiege Congress for these appropriations, we shall have the conservative influence of the property-holders exerted here to prevent improper taxation. I ask the gentleman whether it would not be proper to amend this bill so as to require the property-holders of this District to pay their

Mr. STEVENSON. The objection to that is this: there is a pressing and immediate necessity for the expenditure of this money for the relief of the suffering poor. The District has no money.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will ask the gentleman whether it could not be provided that the District should hereafter refund out of its treasury whatever may be its just proportion of this sum and whether the bill with a provision of that kind could not go through as well as in its present form?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield for a moment to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. BUCKNER.]

Mr. BUCKNER. I want to say only a word in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Blount.] Perhaps he is not aware that this District, with a real estate valuation not exceeding the valuation probably in his district, or certainly in my own, is now bound to pay $1,100,000 in interest upon its debt; and when you propose a scheme for compelling this District to pay a portion of this money, you are only shifting the burden. In other words, the Congress of the United States has to come to the relief of the people of this District, who never will be able of themselves to pay the inof this District, who never will be able of themselves to pay the interest on the $22,000,000 of debt, or the principal either.

Mr. BLOUNT. Therefore it is that we should like to know how much more, in addition to this $20,000, we will have to give to the people of this District.

Mr. BUCKNER. There is a bill pending on that subject before the

Mr. STEVENSON. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."
Mr. BLOUNT. I know that.
Mr. BUCKNER. It is not for this House to pass the bill upon any such idea as that advanced by the gentleman from Georgia.
Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, I have been somewhat surprised that my kind-hearted and amiable friend from Alabama should have upde the convertion has been to this bill. I do not think he is made the opposition he has done to this bill. I do not think he is wanting in the kindly feeling belonging to the best hearts. All efforts to give a political turn to this matter I depreciate. There is no political significance in this bill. Any effort on the part of the gentleman to show that because certain appropriations were made to assist the poor and the destitute in other localities, which, perhaps, were not as proper in their character as they should have been, and that therefore we should turn a deaf ear to the suffering poor people of therefore we should turn a deaf ear to the suffering poor people of this District, is to my mind no response to the appeal.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. Let me ask the gentleman how long this $20,000 will last, and how far it will go in feeding the great body of the hungry people of this country?

Mr. SINGLETON. In answer to that I have this to say. I have conversed with intelligent ladies and gentlemen in this city and they have assured me that while the sum may not be enough to answer all the wants of the poor of this city, yet it will go a great way toward relieving their present distress. ward relieving their present distress.

Mr. Speaker, they are not all criminals who are applying for as-Mr. Speaker, they are not all criminals who are applying for assistance. I repudiate such an idea altogether. The class of people who commit crimes and are brought up before the judicial tribunals to answer for them are not the only ones asking for our charity. There are men and women, and more especially females in this city, who have been turned out of employment and are to-day without a penny in their pockets, and perhaps no place to lay their heads for the night, were it not for the charity of some kind citizens of Washington.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. We have thousands of that sort everywhere in the country.

Mr. SINGLETON. I know we have thousands of them, but it is our duty as stewards of the grace of God, when we find suffering humanity, to extend a helping hand to them. I will commend to the gentleman that portion of the Bible where the man who journeying from Jerusalem to Jericho fell among thieves and was left wounded by the way-side, and while the Levite passed by on one side and the priest on the other, the poor Samaritan came along and extended to him a helping hand and received the blessing of Heaven for it. It is easy for gentlemen who sit here and draw $5,000 a year and expend it as they please to talk about the criminals of the city of Washpend it as they please to talk about the criminals of the city of Washington and throw odium upon this bill upon the ground that they alone will be benefited by it. Why, sir, some of the very best people I know have been impoverished by recent events and to-day are under the necessity of asking charity at the hands of their friends. Now, shall we refuse to grant this pittance to them? Why, sir, I would rather to-day vote to give $20,000 and save human life than to witness to-morrow the cortége of some poor woman who had starved the night before for the want of bread as she is borne off to her silent resting ralese or to visit some home of squalid wretchedness where the night before for the want of bread as she is borne off to her silent resting-place, or to visit some home of squalid wretchedness where some little inoffensive child had frozen to death for want of covering to keep it warm. I shall vote, Mr. Speaker, to give this assistance. I do not believe we will regret it, but that on the contrary we will be blessed in this act of giving, as it is declared "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Mr. Speaker, every member of the Hovee will vote

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, every member of the House will vote for or against this bill with some degree of reluctance. It is a necessity presented to us which we would be glad to avoid if we could. There is difference as to the question of the propriety of voting away money from the Treasury in measures of this kind; and also as to the use to be made of it.

The question raised by the gentleman from Indiana, and also supported by the gentleman from Georgia, as to the best means of re-lieving poverty, is one which has been debated in all nations and in all ages, and has not yet been settled. We cannot defer action on this question because of any doubt in regard to it. There is necessity for this action here. It is greater than can be reported to us by any commission or any committee or than we will find in any report.

I rose, sir, to refer to an incident which both astonished and shocked me a few months ago. I had known a gentleman in this city for something like ten or fifteen years; a man of reputation, of excellent, exemplary character, of education, of refinement, entitled to admission to the best circles of society here. He was a member of the bar of the Supreme Court, a member of the clubs in this city; he had been in former times a member of the clubs of New York, and a man who had borne an excellent reputation, both personal and professional, in one of the great States of the Union. Some months ago, when I came to this city, I read in the morning newspaper that this man, being deprived of the means of support and too proud to make known his wants to any of his friends or acquaintauces, had shut himself up in his room and absolutely starved himself to death. himself up in his room and absolutely starved himself to death. Now I know of course that an appropriation of this kind would perhaps not benefit a person of that sort. But there are many thousand young and old men and women, children and grown persons, who are suffering absolute want, who are upon the verge of starvation, and who would be relieved by an appropriation of this kind.

Now, sir, the Government of the United States cannot evade some decree of responsibility for this condition of things. The processity degree of responsibility for this condition of things. The necessity which is resting upon the business people, and more particularly upon the industrial classes of this country, for the relief of adversity and suffering, is one which they share with the people of other nations. We do not know to what cause we can attribute it. But certainly there is something due to these people and some responsibility on the part of the Government which we ought to consider, and which we ought to recognize on the one side and on the other.

There is not a single municipality in this country, not a city, not a town that will not feel itself compelled to aid the suffering poor in this inclement weather, who, through depression of business and deprivation of employment are without the means of comfortable housing and even of food. And our situation is just exactly like each one of these municipalities throughout the length and breadth of the land. of these municipalities throughout the length and breadth of the land. This Congress is now acting as a municipal legislature. It is acting for a municipality. It is not acting as a Congress. It is not at work for the nation. It is discharging its duties to the suffering people of this municipality just exactly as every city, and every town is taking the same action in regard to the suffering poor of its own locality. We have increased in a large degree this suffering on the part of individuals and of families, because of that indispensable necessity for the reduction of the expenses which has thrown many hundreds of needle suddenly and without any preparation for the future out of the reduction of the expenses which has thrown many hundreds of people suddenly and without any preparation for the future out of employment. They cannot go away from the city. They cannot support themselves here. They have been brought here by the Government. Their families are here; their wives and their children are here in many instances by the action of the Government; and we must relieve them if we have any consideration for the calls of humanity or any proper regard to the sense of public duty. I hope, sir, that this bill will be passed.

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CALDWELL.]

Mr. CALDWELL.]

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I take the floor merely to return my sincere thanks to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] for the kind words uttered in compliment to myself, and to say

Mr. SINGLETON. I said Jericho.
Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. Well, Jericho; be it so. [Laughter.]
I am as favorably inclined to the suffering poor as any man upon the floor of the House can be. But I beg leave to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that my opposition to this bill arises from the conviction that we have no right to take the money of the whole people to support a very small portion of the poverty-stricken people of the country.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentlement allow me one question?

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman allow me one question?
Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. Yes, sir.
Mr. SINGLETON. Is it not a fact that we have taken out, of the hands of the citizens of the District of Columbia the power to legislate for themselves and to make proper legislative provision for the poor?
Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. That is true.
Mr. SINGLETON. Other cities have that power which we have taken from these people. We have to do all the legislation regulating these matters and have become to some extent, therefore, responsible for the care of the poor.

ing these matters and have become to some extent, therefore, responsible for the care of the poor.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I concede, Mr. Speaker, that it is our duty to legislate for this District; but, sir, when I call for the reading of the report of the attorney, he tells us that the appropriations made here have brought into the capital city a population that are paupers and vagrants, and I insist, sir, that every appropriation we make will but increase that population in the District. I would be glad, sir, to see relief brought to the worthy suffering of the country, but I would rather see it brought as the good people of the city are now endeavoring to bring it, by private charity, by active efforts on their part to relieve want. And I would commend to the gentleman from Mississippi the suggestion that it would be better for him and better for me, drawing our $5,000 as Congressmen, rather than put our hands into the public treasury and take $20,000 of the people's money to appropriate to those who will not work—that it would be better for us to take an example from the Frenchman who, being appealed to by his friend to aid a suffering woman, said, "I am would be better for us to take an example from the renchman who, being appealed to by his friend to aid a suffering woman, said, "I am sorry ten dollars' worth; how much are yon sorry?"

Mr. SINGLETON. If ten dollars would relieve me of my responsibility in this matter I would be very thankful to give ten dollars, or ten times ten dollars.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. STEVENSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr.

Cox.7

Mr. SINGLETON. If we had power to send relief across the Atlantic Ocean to the starving poor of Ireland, can we not provide for the wants of our own poor?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. With the permission of the gentlemen from New York, I would offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will pay his ten dollars I have no ob-

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. Caldwell, of Alabama, as follows:

Provided, That $25 of the amount paid shall be paid from the pay due each member of the Senate and House of Representatives and charged to them on their accounts by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. COX. I will not detain the House except by one reference. Two distinguished gentlemen from the South, both advocates, I think, of strict construction, differ on this point, and I think I can reconcile them. Let them both make their su scription and I will assure them, in behalf of the benevolent ladies of this District as well as of the commission, that their contributions as well as what appropriation we make will be well appropriated.

This is not a new appropriation. I find that it has been the custom This is not a new appropriation. I find that it has been the custom for years to vote these appropriations to the poor of this District. I find that in the Forty-second Congress an appropriation was made of $12,000, and again in 1875 there was an appropriation of $20,000. It seems to me therefore that it a little too late now in this emergency to raise any fine constitutional point in this matter of benevolence. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] has well said, we are acting here as a merciful Legislature, and I know from a letter which I hold in my hand, and written by a benevolent lady who has charge of one of the soup-houses or bread-houses on Capitol Hill, that there is here an emergency to day for some help beyond that of prithere is here an emergency to-day for some help beyond that of private benevolence. I do not overstate it, nor do I pretend to any extravagant rhetoric when I say that in the very sight of this Capitol, upon this hill, men and women, old and young, have been crying for bread and have been unable to get it; men have been seeking to bar-ter their muscles and sinews for work and bread and have been unter their muscles and sinews for work and bread and have been unable to make the exchange. Following these kindly precedents to which I have referred, I will not now stick in the bark on any constitutional question. But I would like to see this money wisely and fairly distributed over the entire city. I do not know in full the details of these benevolent provisions which have been made here for the poor, but from a letter which I have here from a friend, a lady friend, written yesterday to my wife, and from the personal observa-tion of that lady who visits around among the poor, I know that these are not cases of sham benevolence. These destitute poor are not tramps who have been drawn into this District for the purpose of not tramps who have been drawn into this District for the purpose of living upon the public Treasury or upon the public kindness; but men, women, and children in utter nakedness, in fever, in sickness, in death, are now starving within sight of this Capitol, and the appeal comes here to us with strong emphasis to help them. I hope that all technicalities will be forgotten and that we shall make a generous appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York that the bill provides that this money shall be distributed in all portions of the city, no one portion of the city or locality having an advantage over another.

vantage over another.

Mr. COX. I was about to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the second section, a proviso that in the distribution of this appropriation due regard shall be had to the various societies, associations, and sections of the District. I would like to put some stress upon that and make it specific.

Mr. BUCKNER. I would say to the gentleman from New York that there are organized committees of relief under the commissioners of the District scattered all over the District.

Mr. COX. I know that Mr. Stickney's organization has some men working on salaries, but the ladies for whom I speak are giving their time to this work with no reward except that which comes to their hearts, and I have a surmise that the distribution from the commissioners might be a little more equal. I have been requested to offer an amendment to make this matter a little more specific than the bill makes it, but I cannot do it in view of what the gentleman from Illimakes it, but I cannot do it in view of what the gentleman from Innois [Mr. STEVENSON] has said.

Mr. STEVENSON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley.]

Mr. Kelley. I have several times voted and sometimes spoken in favor of such a bill as this. It is no novelty, and I want to say to gentlemen who have constitutional scruples that in the anti-war times when the strictest construction of the Constitution prevailed it was found legal and constitutional to send food in a Government vessel to the starving people of Ireland. If in those days that was constitutional, it certainly cannot be unconstitutional for us to feed our own constituents who are suffering from want—want of food, want of fuel, want of adequate clothing—under the shadow of the Capitol, who are brought here from every part of the Union either to Capitol, who are brought here from every part of the Union either to accept employment under the Government or hoping to find it. They are not citizens of this District and it would be injustice on our part to saddle their support upon the people of the District if they were able to bear it. They are not exclusively colored persons who have come here to labor. That class is among them, but I have heard stories of suffering from ladies of culture, ladies who brought to the service of the Government the accomplishments taught in the best schools but who had been removed from amployment by the changes schools, but who had been removed from employment by the change of our system of fractional currency and our giving away the contracts of bank-note printing to other cities. One thousand were removed at one time and four hundred at another who had not the means to get away from the city and who have lingered here in the hope of finding employment. I knows of cases where two or three such ladies are living together in a little room who are being clothed and fed by charity, the charity of their former fellow-workwomen whose condition is scarcely better than their own.

I implore gentlemen to enable the people of the District to take care or our constituents, male and female, who are here pining, in want, freezing and starving, rather than we on constitutional scruples shall prove ourselves wiser than all our predecessors and that our hearts are so indurated that no measure of suffering can kindle symmetric in the measure of suffering can kind pathy in them.

Mr. STEVENSON. I now call the previous question upon the bill. Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. Does the gentleman decline to allow my amendment to be voted upon f
Mr. STEVENSON. I must insist upon the previous question.

JANUARY 29.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engressed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX BILL FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 4293 a bill (H. R. No. 4554) for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. NEAL. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of this entire bill be dispensed with; I can explain its provisions in a few words.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Sec. 12. That the assessment of real property made under the provisions of the Mr. HOLMAN. Since the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] showed me the amendment which he intended to offer, I have been engaged in conversation with gentlemen who are informed upon this subject, and they think that the amount which would be raised under his amendment would hardly be sufficient to meet the requirements of the common-school system of this city. I think it would be much safer to put it at forty cents instead of thirty cents on the hundred dollars. Even then the city of Washington would pay a less school tax than is paid in many of the cities of this Union. The State of Indiana, with an invested school fund of eight or nine millions of dollars, pays a school tax exceeding forty cents on the hundred dollars.

That the assessment of real property made under the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other puposes, "rapproved March 3, 1875, and amendments thereto, is hereby ratified and approved as the assessment, except as hereinafter modified, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and the commissioners of the District, or their successors in office, shall appoint three competent persons to be assessors, and to hold office for the term of five years, unless sooner removed, the salary of each of said assessors to be $1,250 per annum. Said assessors shall, before the 1st day of October, 1877, under the direction of the superintendent of assessments and taxes of said District, assess the value of all the real property not embraced in the assessment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, inclusive of all buildings erected, or roofed, improved, or enlarged, and not herectofore taxed, and all personal property in said District liable to taxation, and shall state the same separately, in books to be kept in a systematic manner; and such value for taxation shall be the true value in the lawful money of the United States of the property so assessed. The assessed value shall have reference to the date of the 1st day of July, 1877, except in regard of buildings erected, roofed, improved, or enlarged subsequent to that date, or, in the case of stock in trade, shall be the average value of the stock or merchandise or other articles kept on hand during the year ending June 31, 1877. That the twenty-third section of the act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia entitled "An act imposing a license on trades, business, and professions practiced or carried on in the District of Columbia," approved August 23, 1871, clause 20 of the twenty-first section of said act, and all other laws and acts, or parts thereof, inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Sec. 15. That the corporation of the District of Columbia is continued for all the purposes of this act and other acts for the collection of taxes, for suing and being sued, for causes arising prior to June 20, 1874, and for acquiring and holding real estate for school and municipal purposes.

Sec. 16. That hereafter no two lots or subdivisions of original or other lots in any square of ground in the District of Columbia shall be designated by the same number or by the same letter of the alphabet, and the commissioners of the District of Columbia, or their successors in office, shall cause the numbers and letters designating lots in all the squares of ground in said District to be revised and changed to conform to this requirement; and they shall make such further changes in the existing numbers or letters designating lots in any of the squares in the cities and villages in said District as may, in their opinion, facilitate and simplify the labor of assessing real estate therein.

Sec. 17. That this act shall remain in force as the tax law of the District of Columbia for each subsequent year after Juno 30, 1878, until repealed.

Mr. NEAL. It will be observed from the reading of this bill that Mr. NEAL. It will be observed from the reading of this bill that it imposes a tax of $1 on each $100 upon all lands outside of the two cities of Georgetown and Washington which are held and used solely and exclusively for agricultural purposes, and a tax of $1.50 upon each $100 upon all other real and personal property in this District. The bill is substantially the same as the one which passed the two Houses of Congress during the last session. There is no essential difference between the two bills except in the machinery for carrying into effect their provisions. ing into effect their provisions.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move to amend the first section of the bill by adding to it the following:

And thirty cents on every one hundred dollars' valuation of real and personal property as a special tax for the support of schools.

Mr. NEAL. I am willing to allow that amendment.

Mr. BUCKNER. That would depend on the number of children. Mr. HOLMAN. It depends of course finally on that, but I think there are few communities in the Northwest, very few counties or States where the tax is not at least as high as forty cents on the hundred dollars for school purposes. This is the case in the State of Indiana, which has the largest invested school fund of any State in the Union, between eight and nine millions of dollars, and our people have never murmured at that tax.

Union, between eight and nine millions of dollars, and our people have never murmured at that tax.

I would say further to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Buckner] that, as I understand, it the amount set apart for school purposes in this District for the present year fiscal is about $370,000. It is found that that amount will support the schools for only eight months in the year, and we are now asked to make an appropriation out of the public Treasury for the education of the children of this District of $75,000, and even then with the two sums it would be possible to support the school only during a period of ten months after the Government has built the school-houses. My friend from Missouri must see that this tax should be raised to at least forty cents on the hundred dollars, and then it would realize but $360,000 on the basis of the assessed valuation of property in this District.

Mr. BUCKNER. According to the last assessment the valuation of the real estate of this District is about $93,000,000, and the total valuation of taxable property $110,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then a tax of forty cents on $100 willrealize $440,-000, which is just about the sum required to carry on the commonschool system of the District for a period of ten months. Inasmuch as this District bears less taxation than any other city perhaps in the country, taking into account all the elements of taxation, I think it can well afford to bear a tax amply sufficient for the support of the school system. Even with the school tax at forty cents, the whole amount of taxation will be but $1.90 on $100, while $2.50 on $100 is about the minimum taxation borne by the people in other parts of the Luion, even the most favored sections.

about the minimum taxation borne by the people in other parts of

The Union, even the most favored sections.

I do not insist upon any excessive taxation; but the fact is now apparent that we must support all the charities of this District. We are called upon annually to appropriate large sums for educational purposes, and I do think that the rate of taxation should approach purposes, and I do think that the rate of taxation should approach somewhat the rate borne by other communities throughout the country. However desirable it may be for Congress to encourage and promote the prosperity of this city, I do not think the rate of taxation should be placed lower than that borne by the people of other sections so as to throw an unreasonable burden upon tax-payers throughout the country, compelling them to contribute largely to the support of public institutions in this District. I hope, therefore, that this change from thirty cents to forty cents will be made so as to insure a sufficient fund to support the common schools of the District.

sufficient fund to support the common schools of the District.

Mr. BUCKNER. It occurs to me that if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] would take into consideration the immense burden that has been imposed upon the people of this District, he would agree that it would probably be much better for them to be satisfied agree that it would probably be much better for them to be satisfied with public-school instruction for only eight months in the year than to incur any additional taxation for school purposes. My friend must forget that 20 per cent. of the entire real estate of this District (if my memory is correct) has been forfeited for the non-payment of taxes. That real estate is now held by the District of Columbia. In the shape of special-improvement taxes, the burden borne by the people of this District during the last few years has exceeded that imposed upon any other people whom I know anything about.

The tax which I propose will realize about $300,000, with which sum I believe the people can maintain their schools; and certainly this amount of extra taxation is as much as ought to be imposed upon them in these hard times and during the present general de-upon them in these hard times and during the present general de-pression of business. Though this may not make their taxation quite equal to that existing in the gentleman's district or my own, yet he should consider that in this District, in consequence of the vast expense for speical improvements and their mismanagement in many cases, there is an extreme degree of tenderness in this District upon the subject of taxation, which gentlemen not thoroughly acquainted with the condition of the District may not well understand.

Mr. HOLMAN. But my friend must see that we have accommodated the rate of taxation to the burden upon the District. As to the enormous debt resting upon the District, the Federal Treasury bears the great burden of that. It is a fact patent to all that the tax now proposed, $1.80 on $100, is below the minimum taxation borne by other communities. We are not asking that the people of this District shall bear an excessive taxation; but it appears to me only proper that they should pay a taxation at least equal to the minimum taxation paid by citizens elsewhere.

Mr. BUCKNER. The valuation of the real estate of this District as given by me is no doubt very high; I doubt whether it will reach the figures I have given.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not make a motion to amend; but I wish to admonish my friend that if this school tax remains at thirty cents the people of this District, who I think would cheerfully bear a proper tax for the support of their common-school system, will have to come to Congress and ask money out of the public Treasury to support their schools. schools

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not know but that Congress is in duty bound to pay for the education of the children of their public servants in this District.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the enlightened citizens of this District would prefer to educate their children by paying their own proper share of taxation rather than tax the people of other sections for this

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. Buckner to the substitute of Mr. Neal was agreed to; and the substitute, as amended, was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate was read announcing that the President had returned to the Senate with his approval the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions that may arise thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish to give notice that on to-morrow, the 30th instant, at one o'clock p. m., I will move that the House proceed to appoint five members of the commission, as provided in section 2 of an act entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877."

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Buckner] yields to me a moment that I may make a statement. I am told by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Wells] that according to his recollection the amount set apart for this District for the present fiscal year was something over $290,000, instead of $370,000. It is very likely the gentleman from Missouri is correct. I think it proper to make this statement, as I might readily be mistaken in reference to make the statement won the since. a matter occurring some months since.

Mr. BUCKNER. I now yield to my colleague on the committee from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] to submit reports from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. O'NELL. I move the House do now adjourn.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending that, by unanimous consent, the Chair will present some requests.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order that it requires one-fifth of a quorum to order tellers; and one-fifth not having voted in favor thereof, tellers are not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 30, 1877.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Byron Sunderland, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of George F. Hoar, elected by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1877; which were read and ordered to be filed.

Mr. BAYARD presented the credentials of ELI SAULSBURY, elected by the Legislature of the State of Delaware a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1877; which were read and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of January 26, 1877, the report of Chief Engineer J. W. King, United States Navy, on European ships of war; which was referred the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota, in favor of the ratification of the treaty with the Sioux Indians for the cession of the Black Hills; which will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, if there be

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will lie on the table. The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Charles Miller and others, of Detroit, Michigan, praying the passage by Congress of a bill allowing pensioners to receive in all cases pensions from the date of their discharge as soldiers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present the petition of Mrs. J. C. McKinney, Etta R. Holmes, Mrs. E. H. Henderson, and others—164 men and 194 women—358 citizens of the State of Iowa, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex.

I may state in this connection that I have before me a letter which advises me that 10,000 names have been sent forward in the last ten days, and that others are upon the way. These good petitioners request that this petition shall not be sent to the waste-basket, but shall receive the respectful and earnest and early attention of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I second their request, and move that the petition be referred to that committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I present the petition of a large number of persons of Parkersburgh, West Virginia, who believe they are entitled to arrears of pensions. I ask the Clerk to read their petition. It is very short, and then the paper can be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Forty-fourth Congress:

We, the undersigned, do most earnestly urge upon Congress the passage of the act allowing pensioners the amount of arrears to which they would be entitled by a removal from the statutes of the unjust limitation which has debarred many from receiving their just dues, and that they shall be entitled to receive in all cases pension from date of discharge of the soluier; that a limitation act of the kind in force is unjust, and that the representatives of the people had no right to take advantage of the accidents and incidents which have occurred in many ways to prevent those who have made the most extreme sacrifice for the country, from receiving the full measure of justice to which they are equitably entitled.

Mr. DAVIS. I will simply say that I am in sympathy with these petitioners, and I trust the committee will give their prayer such at-petitioners, and I trust the committee will give their player such attention as they believe it deserves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question having been reported upon, the petition will lie upon the table.

Mr. BAYARD presented the petition of Robert M. Sylvester and 29 others, citizens of Kenton, Delaware, praying for the passage of the act allowing pensioners the amount of arrears to which they would be entitled by a removal from the statutes of the unjust limitation which has debarred many from receiving their just dues, and that they shall be entitled to receive in all cases pensions from the date of the discharge of the soldier; which was ordered to lie on the table. the table.

demption of real estate sold under judgments and decrees in the courts of the United States, to report it with certain amendments. I may state that this bill has been before the committee since June last, and, by reason of circumstances that I need not refer to, has been delayed during the days of this session. I shall not ask for its consideration this morning, but shall esteem it to be my duty to ask the attention of the Senate to it at as early a day as may be practicable, as it is vitally important to have early action if it is to be passed at this ses-

DISTRICT COURT OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (8. No. 1139) to change the time of holding the October term of the United States district court for the holding the October term of the United States district court for the district of Nebraska, to report it without amendment. At the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska at my right. [Mr. PADDOCK,] and as it is merely a local bill proposing to change the time of holding the district court in Nebraska so as to make it correspond with the time of holding the circuit court there, and thus avoid expense and trouble, I should like to have the Senate consider the bill at this time. It merely proposes to change the time of holding the district court at Omaha from a time in October to a time in November, to correspond with the time of holding the circuit court.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will state in addition that the bill itself was drawn by the United States district judge of that State and for-drawn by the United States district judge of that State and forwarded to me. I hope the Senate will consider it now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1204) to amend the statutes in relation to damages for infringement of patents, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciar the Judiciary.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1205) to authorize the board of trustees of the city of Cheyenne, Wyoming Territory, to enter and purchase for the use of said city certain public lands; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1206) for the relief of Eugenia R. Hutton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1207) to provide for the settlement and payment of certain claims against the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 31) to promote the utility of the Library of Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. HAMLIN. On the 18th instant I submitted a bill to the Senate changing the compensation paid to postmasters of the fourth class. I then moved distinctly that it should be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, but it escaped my atten-tion in the reading of the Journal that it was inadvertently referred tion in the reading of the Journal that it was inadvertently referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I have conferred with the chairman of that committee, and with his approval I move that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (8. No. 1155) to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1876, and for other purposes, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. INGALLS. I offer an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 4452) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes. The amendment is in relation to the Miami Indians of Kansas. Accompanying the amendment is a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relating to the same subject. I move that the amendment and communication be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that both be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION TO THE CAPITOL DURING COUNT.

 $Mr.\ HAMLIN.\ At the suggestion of certain Senators I submit the following resolution :$

Resolved. That the Committee on Rules be directed to inquire what, if any, rules should be adopted for admissions to the Capitol during the canvassing of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and that said committee be directed to confer with the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS OF ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the proceedings before the commission provided for by an act entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, approved January 29, 1877, be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from day to day.

Mr. DAVIS. I see that there are several members of the committee to devise a mode for counting the electoral vote absent, and I think the resolution had better lie over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate now proceed, in accordance with the act entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, 1877, to appoint by viva voce vote five Senators to be members of the commission in said act provided for.

I do not ask the consideration of the resolution at this moment. propose that it shall go to the table for the present, but I shall call it up, say at three o'clock. I give notice that I shall call it up at three or half past three o'clock, so that Senators may all be present.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator name the hour now?

Mr. WRIGHT. I propose to call it up at half past three o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have the resolution reported again. A number of Senators here did not hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. STEVENSON. Did I understand the Senator from Iowa to fix the hour when he will call it up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has fixed half past three o'clock this afternoon. There being no objection, the resolution will lie on the table until called up.

HICKEY'S CONSTITUTION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am requested to offer a resolution with the view of having it referred to the Committee on Print-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to procure from the proprietors one hundred copies of Hickey's Constitution of the United States for the use of Senators: Provided, The same can be obtained at the rate of $1.50 per copy.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

TELLERS AT THE COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the President of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint two tellers on the part of the Senate to perform the duties required by the act entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, 1877.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the following report:

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3156) to perfect the revision of the statutes of the United States, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 18, 19, 20, and 21, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 15, and 17.

I. P. CHRISTIANCY,

WM. A. WALLACE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

M. J. DURHAM,

S. N. BELL,

D. C. DENISON,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

WARREN MITCHELL.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to give notice that on the day after to-morrow, in the morning hour, I shall call up the bill (S. No. 1145) for the relief of Warren Mitchell, of Kentucky.

REMAINS OF R. F. LEHMAN.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 1187, which was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs this

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 1187) authorizing the Secretary of War to allow the interment, in the National Cemetery at New Berne, in the State of North Carolina, of the remains of the late R. F. Lehman, lately a commissioner of the United States circuit court in the eastern district of North Carolina, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON ELECTORAL BILL.

Mr. WRIGHT. There accompanied the bill relating to the counting of the electoral vote, with notice of its approval by the President, yesterday, a message of the President which I think is important and yesterday, a message of the President which I think is important and valuable. I think, as a matter of just respect to the President and the importance of the question, and especially its importance to the people of this country and the interest they take in the general question, and also in the matters stated in the message, it would be but right and proper that extra copies of that message be printed. I therefore, if the Secretary will be good enough to regard the resolution as in form, move that 10,000 copies of the message accompanying the bill be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

ALFRED ROULAND.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the considera-

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3367.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3367) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Alfred Rouland was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, on the 16th instant:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3367) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Alfred Rouland, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

The testimony in this case fully supports the report of the House Committee on Military Affairs, and justifies the action proposed by the bill.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the same.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is no report at all. I ask that the House report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the House committee will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. ALPHEUS S. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, May 4, 1876:

House of Representatives, May 4, 1876:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Alfred Rouland, late of the Twenty-third and Twenty-eighth Regiments, Michigan Volunteer Infantry, having had the case under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

That from the testimony in this case it appears that the said Alfred Rouland was enrolled and mustered into the Twenty-third Michigan Infantry on the 18th day of January, 1864, "for three years or during the war." He was at the time of his muster a mere youth of less than seventeen years of age. It is in evidence that he served with marked fidelity during Sherman's campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta and in Thomas's campaign in Tennessee, including the battles of Franklin and Nashville, and afterward in the capture of Fort Anderson and Wilmington, North Carolina.

The captain of his company, John Hamilton, (now a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church,) testifies "that during said Rouland's connection with said company, before his transfer to the Twenty-eighth Michigan Infantry, he was always a brave, faithful, and efficient soldier, and never for a moment flinched in any duty; that he was one of the best soldiers of said company, though being then a mere stripling of seventeen or eighteen years; and that it is his confident belief that said Rouland would have been one of the last men in the Army to have intentionally deserted, and that he is entitled to an honorable discharge on account of his faithful service."

In June, 1865, the Twenty-third Regiment was mustered out of service, and young Rouland was transferred to the Twenty-eighth Michigan Infantry, and made a corporal in Company F of that regiment. The testimony of Lieutenant C. II DeClute, commanding the company in this regiment, says: "During the time he (Rouland) was with me, which was till after the conclusion of hostilities, he was a brave, faithful, and efficient soldier. When he left the company he was sick, and I am of opinion that he was in great danger of dying. There was, I am convinced, no intention on his part to desert, but his action was a desperate attempt to save his life. Before he could rejoin his regiment it was mustered out." The petitioner left the hospital at Wilmington on the 16th of April. 1866, nearly one year after hostilities had ceased. His regiment returned to Michigan, and was mustered out soon afterward. It is in testimony that he had suffered sometime previously from fever and ague and intermittent fevers and was much emaciated and reduced in strength and spirits, so much so that after reaching the home of his brother in Michigan his life for sometime was considered in great danger, and he did not wholly recover for months afterward.

In view of the premises, and especially considering the long and faithful service of this young soldier, extending to a period of nearly a year beyond the fair construction of his contract of service with the Government, and the despondent condition of his mind resulting from the peculiar and severe character of the petitioner's illness, your committee are of the opinion that the stigma of deserious should be removed from his military record, and that he is justly entitled to an honorable discharge.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. I submit that there is no denial of the desertion; none at all. There is an apology, on the ground of his sickness, that he possibly went home in order to save his life; but it is not denied that the man deserted the service. If cases of that sort not denied that the man deserted the service. If cases of that sort are to be relieved, you had better abolish all your laws in regard to service in the Army and Navy. All meritorious cases can be relieved by the Secretary of War; and where the Secretary of War cannot do it and will not do it, I do not think Congress ought to undertake to do it, especially when you have not the facts here.

It is stated that the boy, if he was a boy, left the service without permission, and remained out of the service until the regiment was disbanded and broken up, and he was marked a deserter. Possibly he did not intend to desert; possibly he did not know that he was doing it; but every soldier is bound in duty to know whether he deserts the service or not. I think it is a grave matter to pass a special act of Congress overruling the action of the Secretary of War in cases of that sort. You leave the Secretary of War without any inducement to execute the law and discharge his duty. I hope the bill ducement to execute the law and discharge his duty. I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. CLAYTON. This is not a case of overruling the Secretary of War at all. It was a military court-martial that convicted the man of this charge of desertion, as I understand. This is a case of this kind: The man entered the service near the close of the war. The regiment that he entered the service in was disbanded after the war was over. He was then transferred to another regiment. He served in that a considerable length of time. He was taken sick and sent to a hospital. He was in hospital for a long time and his life was in a critical condition. The man went home in that sickly condition from the hospital. There is evidence here to prove that while he was home he said to his friends and relatives that he must go back as soon as he got well, and he intended to go back. He never intended to desert the service of the United States at all. He remained in the service over a year after the end of the war. He entered the service for three over a year after the end of the war. He entered the service for three years or during the war. He remained in the service for over a year after the war. That does not amount to anything, however; but the whole point is that the man never intended to desert. He simply left the hospital after lying there a long while, and went to his home to remain there until he got well and then go back to his regiment again, which was no doubt a thing which he thought he had a right to do. It seems to me that it is a very small matter to deny this poor private soldier the relief he asks for under the circumstances.

Mr. HAMILTON. If it is the object of the Senate to give the man a gratuity, to help him if his necessities require help, that is one thing; and to alter the rolls on file in the War Department is another thing. It makes the rolls state what is not true, and I for one will never agree that the rolls may be taken up in the War Department and mutilated and all the marks of desertion and everything of that kind swept off. You might as well do it by wholesale in the case of every man, because I guarantee that you will never find any man who will not say it was not his intention to desert. They all deny any such intention. But when they are marked deserters and stand in that way until the regiment is disbanded, I do not think there ought to be any remedy for them.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will say that in this case the report of the committee is unanimous.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD ACTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired and the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, being the bill (S. No. 984) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Oregon, who has the floor, proceeds, I wish to say that I shall ask the Senate to dispose of this bill to-day. If any measure is to pass, there is no time to be lost in its passage, if it is to become a law at this session of Congress. If no measure can pass, then the sooner we know that fact and cease to waste time upon it the better it will be for the busifact and cease to waste time upon it the better it will be for the business of the country. I therefore hope that it will be the pleasure of the Senate to come to some conclusion on this subject to-day. For reasons that are known to the Senate, I shall probably not be able to be in the Senate for several days after to-day; and as this bill has been particularly in my charge, put there by the Judiciary Committee, I want this day devoted to it; and I want to see it disposed of if such be the pleasure of the Senate such be the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. WEST. As the Senator from Ohio has not asked for any decision at the moment on this question, I will say that I hardly think the Senate will be prepared to come to any conclusion to-day on the subject, because I know a number of Senators that are anxious not only to study the question but to address the Senate on the subject. If the Senator will give notice that on some day, to-morrow, for instance, he will ask for a vote, so as to afford gentlemen an opportunity to prepare themselves to address the Senate, I think that might be agreed upon; but a notice served to-day, or any day that a vote will be called on that day, without more notice than this, I doubt will be called on that day, without more notice than this, I doubt whether the Senate will assent to.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, one word, with the indulgence of my friend from Oregon. There are few subjects of more importance before Congress than this bill; yet I noticed that during the very able speech of the Senator from Oregon yesterday oftentimes there were not more than a dozen Senators in their seats. If I said that I should ask for a vote on this bill to-morrow, and if I were to name five o'clock to-morrow, I very much fear there would not be half a dozen Senators in their seats this whole day. I do not want that. I want all Senators to hear what this measure is and to understand it, so that they may vote understandingly upon it; and if Senators are so that they may vote understandingly upon it; and if Senators are prepared to address the Senate they can do it to-day. I cannot, therefore, accede to the idea that I shall ask the Senate to dispose of the bill to-morrow. If at the end of this day the Senate is not prepared to vote upon it, then it can go over until to-morrow; but I do not foreclose the expression of my wish that we may dispose of it to-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor.

Mr EATON. My friend will allow me a moment. I desire to be heard on this bill. Physically I am unable to speak to-day, therefore I wish to ask that the bill go over until to-morrow. Under any circumstances, I do not propose that a vote be taken to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. I agree fully with all that the Senator from Ohio has said in reference to the importance of some speedy, proper legislation upon this subject, but as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Railroads, I hardly think it would be proper to attempt to force a decision upon this question to-day on so short a notice. If notice were given that a vote would be insisted upon, say to-morrow or on Monday next, it would enable all who desire to be heard and who desire to be here at the final vote an opportunity to be present at that time.

At the adjournment of the Senate yesterday, Mr. President, I was speaking of the effect of the eighteenth section of the act of July 1, speaking of the effect of the eighteenth section of the act of July 1, 1862, in which is contained a reservation of power on the part of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal that act, and I had referred to a statement made by the Committee on the Judiciary in their report as presented to the Senate by the Senator from Ohio, in which that committee refers to this section and gives it construction. I desire to read what the committee say on this subject. It is found on page 4 of their report and is as follows: port, and is as follows:

By the eighteenth section of said act of July I, 1862, it is declared that "the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure the Government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act."

It has been said that this is a very limited power to alter or amend the act, and that the act only authorizes the alteration or amendment in order to promote the construction of the railroad and telegraph line and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (and particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes. Were this limited interpretation placed on the reservation, it would not, in the opinion of your committee, defeat the bill they report; for, although said roads and telegraph lines have been constructed, yet it is manifest, having reference to their pecuniary condition, that some such measure as that now recommended is necessary in order to keep them in working order and to secure to the Government at all times the use and benefits of the same. It needs no argument to prove that nsolvent railroad corporations, or corporations in danger of insolvency, cannot be relied upon to furnish the Government the benefits contemplated by said act. In view of the liberal aid afforded by the Government to said companies, the objects to be attained by the construction of said railroad and telegraph lines, and the general principles of interpretation of corporate grants of power, your committee are of the opinion that the reservation of a right to add to, alter, or amend said act ought to be liberally construed for the public benefit.

Conceding, therefore, for the sake of the argument, that the reser-Conceding, therefore, for the sake of the argument, that the reservation of a right to add to, alter, or amend enlarges the scope of legislative power, and admitting furthermore that such reservation should be construed liberally for the public benefit, still is it not a most unwarrantable conclusion to hold in the case under consideration that the fact even of insolvency, were such fact admitted or proven—much less a mere legislative assumption or a mere apprehension of insolvency or unhealthy "pecuniary condition," to use the language of the committee—would give Congress jurisdiction to declare forfeitures, to interfere with vested rights, to destroy obligations, and all upon the theory that there had been such a failure upon the part of these companies as is specified in section 18 of the act of 1862, and upon which failure alone this section confers upon Con-the part of these companies as is specified in section 18 of the act of 1862, and upon which failure alone this section confers upon Congress the right to exercise enlarged and unusual legislative powers?

But it is said the reservation of the power to alter, amend, or repeal contained in section 22 of the act of 1864 is, to use the language of the report of the Judiciary Committee, "as broad as words can make it," and that, therefore, the right to change this contract by legislation is complete. But the answer to this is, aside from other reasons already given by me, twofold. The first answer is to be found in another position assumed by the Judiciary Committee in their report, and one, too, which I believe is correct, and that is that the two acts of 1862 and 1864 should be construed in pari materia, as constituting for purposes of interpretation but one act. If this be true, then, it seems to me, it is clear that the limitation upon the reservation of the power to alter, amend, or repeal contained in the eighteenth section of the act of 1862 must be held and construed as attaching to and limiting the reservation contained in the twenty-second section of the act of 1862. But were this not so, then, inasmuch as the act of 1864 confers no franchises, but simply changes in some respects with consent of both parties some of the terms of the contract already made, it seems to me no power exists under this reservation to now change sent or both parties some or the terms of the contract already made, it seems to me no power exists under this reservation to now change these terms in material respects without the consent of all parties.

Admit, for the argument, that the "pecuniary condition" of the companies operating this great continental highway is an embarrassing one, as intimated in the report of the committee, does it follow legitimately by any logical process of reasoning or fair legal deduction that the road itself will not be kept in working order or that the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes will not at all times be secured to the Government † Most certainly not. Why, not only insolvency, but utter ruin and financial death might overtake and overwhelm these corporations in one common, inextricable financial wreck, and still this great national highway, a inextricable financial wreek, and still this great national highway, a nation's pride and a nation's power, would remain, and, if not by these companies, by their successors it would doubtless be kept in working order, and its use and benefits would remain secured to the Government at all times for the purposes specified. And if this at any time hereafter should not be so then it will be time enoughto declare that the failure contemplated in section 18 has happened.

It may be true, then, that the "pecuniary condition" of these companies is not such as the Government might desire it to be. It may be true, as charged that there has been fraud in the construction of panies is not such as the Government might desire it to be. It may be true, as charged, that there has been fraud in the construction of the road. It may be admitted that there have been departures from the right in its management. We may concede that the Union Pacific has never, as has been alleged, paid in the amount of stock which its contract with the Government called for. Yes, more; we may not attempt to deny, defend, or palliate the inexcussble practices that found their existence in, and which has stamped with infamy the famous, or I might perhaps better say the infamous, Credit Mobilier. But still, conceding all these things to be true, I confidently contend that they would not and cannot confer upon Congress any power whatever to destroy vested rights or disturb the obligations of contracts, that it would not have, had these things not occurred. There may be, and unquestionably are, remedies for all these evils, both in Congress and in the courts, but one of these is not, in my judgment, the passage of a law that either destroys rights already vested under the terms of the contract, that cancels obligations created in pursuance of it, or which takes private property for public use without ance of it, or which takes private property for public use without

But the bill of the Judiciary Committee not only does this, not only says to these corporations, "Although your contract with the Government provides that you shall not be called upon for the interest until the bonds mature, we will compel you to pay into the Treasury annually a certain sum as a sinking fund for this purpose; although your contract with the Government stipulates that only one-half of the compensation for services rendered the Government shall be retained, we will authorize and compel the retention of the whole amount; although your contract under the law, plainly and without ambiguity defines what shall constitute 'net earnings,' still we will, by legislation, give another and a different definition to these terms, and one tion, give another and a different definition to these terms, and one which increases the pecuniary obligations of one of the contracting parties without its consent; although under your contract you are obligated to pay into the Treasury of the United States annually the sum of 5 per cent. on your 'net earnings,' as those terms were defined and understood at the time your contract was made, leaving to you the option of paying as much more annually as you may wish, still we will now compel you by legislation; without your consent, to pay a sum into the Treasury annually, largely in excess of 5 per cent. on your net earnings, under the new definition of these terms." This bill not only does all this and more, but, as if to cap the climax of what, if this bill were not the creation of so able a committee, I would say seems to me a most unwarrantable assumption of legislative power; it is provided in section 11: That in the event of any of said railroad companies failing to perform all and singular these new requirements, and all and singular the requirements of the acts of 1862 or 1864, or of any other act relating to such company, to be by it performed, of any other act relating to such company, to be by it performed, for the period of six months next after such performance may be due, that then such failure shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights, privileges, grants, and franchises derived or obtained by it from the Government of the United States; and enjoining upon the Attorney-General in such event the duty of causing such forfeiture to be judicially declared.

This section reads as follows as reported by that committee:

SEC. 11. That if any of said several railroad companies shall fail to perform all and singular the requirements of this act and of the acts hereinbefore mentioned, and of any other act relating to said company, to be by it performed, for the period of six months next after such performance may be due, such failure shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights, privileges, grants, and franchises derived or obtained by it from the United States; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to cause such forfeiture to be judicially enforced.

Here, then, it will be observed a forfeiture is declared not only for a failure to comply with the new and onerous terms sought to be ingrafted upon the contract by the provisions of this bill, but a forfeiture is also declared in the event of a failure upon the part of these companies to perform all and singular the requirements of the acts of 1862 and 1864, and of any other act relating to such companies, to be by them performed, and the failure to perform many of which did not, under the terms and conditions of the acts of 1862 and 1864, operate as a forfeiture. For instance, section 15 of the act of July 2, 1864, prescribes a duty to be performed by these companies and fixes the penalty; that penalty is a forfeiture to the person injured for each offense the sum of $100, and such other damage as he may have suffered, but the bill under discussion would, in the broad and comprehensive language of section 11, declare a new and different penalty for a failure to perform the duty prescribed in section 15 of the act of 1364; it would declare on such failure a forfeiture of all the rights, privileges, grants, and franchises of such company derived or obtained Here, then, it will be observed a forfeiture is declared not only for privileges, grants, and franchises of such company derived or obtained by it from the United States. Again, various other duties are imposed on these companies which they are in the most imperative terms re-quired to perform, but in reference to which no forfeiture is declared in the original acts in the event of a failure to perform them. For instance, in section 20 of the act of July 1, 1862, certain requirements are imposed on these companies in imperative terms, and yet no penalty of forfeiture or otherwise, so far as I am able to see, is prescribed. That section of the act of 1862 reads as follows:

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted. That the corporation hereby created and the roads connected therewith, under the provisions of this act, shall make to the Secretary of the Treasury an annual report, wherein shall be set forth—

"Shall make." Now here is a duty imposed on these companies by this section; they shall do this thingmake to the Secretary of the Treasury an annual report, wherein shall be set forth-

First. The names of the stockholders and their places of residence, so far as the une can be ascertained; Second. The names and residences of the directors, and all other officers of the company;

Third. The amount of stock subscribed, and the amount thereof actually paid in;
Fourth. A description of the lines of road surveyed, of the lines thereof fixed upon for the construction of the road, and the cost of such surveys;
Fifth. The amount received from passengers on the road;
Sixth. The amount received for freight thereon;
Seventh. A statement of the expense of said road and its fixtures; Eighth. A statement of the indebtedness of said company, setting forth the various kinds thereof. Which report shall be sworn to by the president of the said company, and shall be presented to the Secretary of the Treasury on or before the 1st day of July in each year.

the 1st dây of July in each year.

If there has been any clause in any act passed since that time, repealing that provision, it has escaped my attention. I know of none. I think it is to-day a part of the law of the land, a part of the act of 1862, and here as I have read are certain imperative duties imposed on these corporations, required of them if you please, to use the language of the Senator who made the report in support of the bill of the Judiciary Committee; and yet there is no penalty at all, much less a penalty of forfeiture of all rights and franchises of the companies, in the event of a failure of the companies to comply with the requirements of section 20. Yet we find that this section 11 provides that, if these companies or any of them "shall fail to perform all and singular the requirements of "—What?" of this act." That is all right, but what next? "and of the acts hereinbefore mentioned," namely, the act of July 1, 1862, and the act of July 2, 1864; and then, as though that were not broad enough, the committee say, "and of any other act relating to said company, to be by it performed for a any other act relating to said company, to be by it performed for a period of six months next after such performance may be due, such failure shall operate as a "-What?" "shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights, privileges, grants, and franchises derived or obtained by it from the United States; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to cause such forfeiture to be judicially enforced."

That is the character of the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee; and if there is anything to be said in defense of this section 11 of that bill, I for one should like to hear it from the honorable member of that committee from Ohio who makes this report, when he comes to speak on this subject. I am now not talking on the question of the importance of having a settlement of this controversy between the Government and these railroad companies; I am directing my attention purely to the question of constitutional power on the part of Congress to pass the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee.

The bill, then, not only prescribes new and onerous conditions and imposes obligations that are entire strangers to the original contract, but declares wholesale forfeitures for a simple failure on the part of the companies to perform requirements contained in the original contract, and against a failure to perform which no forfeiture was imposed in the original acts.

In any and every possible view, therefore, of this question I am forced to the conclusion that the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee should not receive the sanction of the Senate. I have been mittee should not receive the sanction of the Senate. I have been led to these statements of my objections to this bill from the fact that the Committee on Railroads, of which I am a member, had at the last session and also at the present this whole question under long and careful consideration; and the final action of that committee, in which I fully concurred, being in such direct conflict upon the law of the case with the views embodied in the bill proposed by the Judiciary Committee, I have felt it my duty to give some of my reasons why I cannot support the pending measure.

The result of the investigations of this important subject by the Committee on Railroads is embodied in the bill reported from that committee by its chairman on the 19th of the present month—being Senate bill No. 1134—and which is offered as a substitute for the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee. That bill shall receive my hearty support. It proceeds upon the theory, not of force or arbireported from the Judiciary Committee. That bill shall receive my hearty support. It proceeds upon the theory, not of force or arbitrary interference with vested rights, but of amicable adjustment of the accounts between the Government and these railroad companies upon a basis that will in the end secure to the Government full indemnity against loss, and at the same time not violate its own faith nor disturb the vested rights of the companies. It provides in brief: first, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall carry to the credit of a sinking fund for the Central Pacific and Union Pacific Railroad Companies the amount due or which may be due to the said companies repanies the amount due or which may be due to the said companies respectively for the carriage and transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores for the Government up to and including the 31st day of December, 1876. And if this does not amount at that date to the sum of $1,000,000 each, then the companies shall make up the deficiency; if it exceeds such sum then the excess over $1,000,000 is to be paid to the companies. It provides in the second place that each of these two principal companies, the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific, shall each pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $750,000 per annum in equal semi-annual incific and the Union Pacific, shall each pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $750,000 per annum in equal semi-annual installments, on the 1st day of April and October, in each year, commencing on the 1st day of next October, either in lawful money or in any bonds or securities of the United States at par, until such sums shall, with interest thereon added thereto semi-annually at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, be sufficient, when added to the other sums to the credit of such sinking funds, to pay off and extinguish the Government bonds advanced to these companies under the act of July 1, 1852, and the acts a mending the same or supplemental thereto. July 1, 1862, and the acts amending the same or supplemental thereto, together with 6 per cent. interest thereon from the respective dates of such bonds up to the date when they are so paid and extinguished. of such bonds up to the date when they are so plat and extinguished. It is provided further, however, that in the event that such payments shall not prove sufficient to extinguish the Government bonds and interest thereon as I have stated by the 1st day of October, in the year 1912—thirty-five years hence—that then the semi-annual payments upon the part of these companies shall be increased to such a sum as will be sufficient for that purpose. It is also provided that such payments shall be in lieu of all other payments or requirements from such companies, but, until the claims of the Government for said bonds and interest are fully paid, such companies shall not in any manner be released from their present liabilities. It is furthermore provided that each of such companies shall have the option at any time to anticipate any or all of the semi-annual payments by the pay-ment to the Government of the then present value of such semi-an-ment to the Government of the then present value of such semi-annual payments discounted at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, but the sum so paid shall not be less than $1,000,000 at any one time.

It is also a provision of the bill that the Government mortgage, created by the fifth section of the act of July 1,1862, amended by the act of July 2, 1864, shall not in any way be impaired or released by the operations of this bill, should it become a law, until the obligations of said companies respectively to the Government are fully performed; that such mortgage until such time shall remain in full force and virtue, and upon the failure of such companies to perform the obligations imposed upon them by this bill such mortgage shall be enforced as though this bill had not passed, each company, however, to be credited by the Government upon said mortgage with all payments which may have been made in part execution of the provisions of this bill; and, finally, it is provided in the sixth section of the bill that if its provisions shall be accepted by the said railroad companies within four months from the date of its passage, by votes of the directors its provisions shall be accepted by the said railroad companies within four months from the date of its passage, by votes of the directors and stockholders at regular meetings duly called, the same shall be deemed and construed to be a final settlement between the Government and the company or companies so accepting the same such acceptance to be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury.

These are the main features of the bill reported by the Committee or Pailwards.

on Railroads.

Assuming then that the theory of that committee in reference to the power of Congress in the premises is correct, is the settlement proposed in this bill one that is, under all the facts and circumstances, reasonable and just both to the Government and the railroad companies? And furthermore, is it not a settlement infinitely more advantageous to the Government than would be the condition of the Government under existing state of facts?

What is the amount of the debt, principal and interest, that these companies will be owing the Government at its maturity and what is the present security held by the Government for its ultimate payment? A comparison of these for a moment with the compromise proposed in the bill of the Railroad Committee will show at a glance that the interests of the Government will be much more largely pro-that the interests of the Government will be much more largely protected under the latter than the former.

The whole amount of Government bonds issued to the Central Pacific and the Western Pacific, now a part of the Central Pacific, was $27,855,680. These bonds mature on an average in 1898. The interest on this amount at that date will be $50,140,224; principal and interest,

The whole amount of Government bonds issued to the Union Pacific is $27,236,512. The interest on this sum, at the maturing in 1898, will be $49,025,721, making principal and interest $76,262,233.

The sum-total, therefore, of principal and interest that will be due the Government of the United States in 1898 or 1900—twenty-one years hence—will reach the enormous sum of $154,257,137. And as a security for the ultimate payment of this amount the Government has what? First, the one-half of all compensation for services rendered or to be rendered by these companies for the Government; second, 5 per cent. annually of the net earnings of the road, together with the annual accumulations of interest on these amounts; and, third, a second mortgage upon the road itself and rolling-stock, fixtures, and other property, together with any portion of the land grant that may then remain in the ownership of the companies. This mortgage is a second lien subordinate to a first mortgage of I believe $30,000 per mile on each mile of the road, bearing annual interest. What can mile on each mile of the road, bearing annual interest. What can the Government expect annually from the one-half compensation for services rendered ?

The Union Pacific Railroad Company has charged the United States for services rendered in the way of transportation for the nine years ending December 31, 1875, $7,290,252.89, or an average annual charge of $810,028.10; the one-half of which is $405,014.05, to which the Government is entitled.

In the four years ending June 30, 1874, the amount charged for services rendered the Government by the Central Pacific Company and the four years ending June 30, 1674, the amount charged for services rendered the Government by the Central Pacific Company was $1,406,092.48, or an average yearly amount of $351,523.12; the one-half of which the Government is entitled to retain is $175,761.56 annually, making the sum-total, taking these years as an average, from these two companies as half compensation for services rendered of $580,715.61. To this amount we add 5 per cent. in the case of the Union Pacific of the amount which that company concedes, as I am advised, is net earnings, which is arrived at by declaring a dividend of 8 per cent. upon their capital stock of $36,475,000, which would make their net earnings, as per their statement, $2,918,000, 5 per cent. of which is $145,900, and in the case of the Central Pacific 5 per cent. upon the amount which I understand that company admits are net earnings, which is arrived at by declaring a dividend of 8 per cent. upon their capital stock of $54,275,500, and which amounts to $4,342,040,5 per cent. of which is $144,734.65, making a total annual payment from these two companies, taking this as an average, arising from the 5 per cent. on net earnings of the road, of $290,634.65, or a sum-total annually from the two companies by reason of services performed and the 5 per cent. on net earnings of $870,510.70. This I do not concede is by any means the full amount that these companies should of right pay annually from these two sources under the existing contract, but this I understand is the admit payment and the contract. of right pay annually from these two sources under the existing contract; but this I understand is the claim made by the companies as to their rights under existing contracts. Taking into consideration, therefore, all the adverse circumstances in which the Government is placed, the prior mortgage of the holders of the companies' bonds, the controversy now pending in the courts as to the date of the completion of the road so as to fix the time for the commencement of the annual payment of the 5 per cent. on the net earnings, the more than probability of the Government being compelled either to pay off the enormous debt held by the prior bondholders in cash pay on the enormous dept held by the prior bondholders in cash prior to the year 1900, or else to surrender all security under its own subsequent mortgage at that time, is it not wisdom on the part of Congress, if the consent of these companies can be had to the propositions contained in the bill reported by the railroad committee, to give it the sanction of legislative action? Under this bill the Government, in addition to $2,000,000 in hand for services performed, will receive annually in semi-annual payments the sum of one million and a half of dollars. And, if necessary, these annual payments are to be increased, so that the sinking fund thus provided will, in thirty-five years from date, re-imburse the Government the whole amount of onds it has issued, together with 6 per cent. per annum thereon from

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, in opening this bill—for I am opening it now, having consented for the convenience of the Senator from Oregon that he should precede me—I shall not take up as much time as perhaps the importance of the subject demands; because, if Senators are disposed to understand this question (and I know that if they realize its importance they will be disposed to understand it) the panted reports from the various committees of the House and the Senate by whom the subject has been considered will give to any one who will read them all the information he can want. My only excuse for speaking at all is that it may be for the convenience of Senators who have not had time to look at these reports to have a comparatively brief statement of the case.

As is well known, the first act on the subject of the Pacific Railroads was the act of 1862. Nothing was done under that act by the companies except to perfect an organization and perhaps to acquire a very small amount of stock, barely sufficient to qualify the persons chosen for directors to hold those places. By that act Congress made great grants to a company to aid in the construction of the road—a company which has since been known as the Union Pacific Railroad Company Company-commencing at the one hundredth meridian and running westward, and to a company chartered by the State of California known as the Central Pacific, and which was authorized by the act of Congress to unite with the Union Pacific Railroad at a point in Utah; and with further provisions authorizing branches of these rail-roads, and especially of the Union Pacific, to be constructed, and pro-viding that that branch which first was constructed from the Missouri River to the one hundredth meridian should become a part of the main line. Accordingly that branch which was constructed from Omaha in Nebraska to the one hundredth meridian, being first completed, became part of the main stem of the Union Pacific Railroad. Then there were various other branches; that branch which has since become known as the Kansas Pacific; another the Central Branch; another the Sioux City; and perhaps some others. By the first act of 1862, as I said, the Government promised an immense land grant to aid in the construction of the road, but not a land grant simply; it provided a loan of Government credit, varying from $16,000 to $32,000 a mile, in bonds of the United States having thirty years to run. The fifth section of that act provided:

run. The fifth section of that act provided:

And to secure the repayment to the United States, as hereinafter provided, of the amount of said bonds so issued and delivered to said company, together with all interest thereon which shall have been paid by the United States, the issue of said bonds and delivery to the company shall ipso facto constitute a first mortgage on the whole line of the railroad and telegraph, together with the rolling-stock, fixtures, and property of every kind and description, and in consideration of which said bonds may be issued; and on the refusal or failure of said company to redeem said bonds, or any part of them, when required so to do by the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with the provisions of this act, the said road, with all the rights, functions, immunities, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and also all lands granted to the said company by the United States, which, at the time of said default shall remain in the ownership of the said company, may be taken possession of by the Secretary of the Treasury for the use and benefit of the United States.

They was the required states.

That was the provision in the original charter, and the Senate will ee that it gave to the Government the first lien upon the road, upon all its fixtures, upon all its running stock; in a word, upon all its property, and provided in the most ample manner for enforcing that lieu and thus securing the Government. Nothing was done, as I have said, under that act of 1862 but to organize the companies. In 1864, they came to Congress and prevailed on Congress to pass an amendthey came to Congress and prevailed on Congress to pass an amendatory act by which these companies were authorized to create a first mortgage on their roads, to secure the payment of company bonds to be issued by the companies respectively; and that act released the lien of the United States, which up to its passage was the first lien, as I have just read, and made the mortgage of the companies the first lien, thus subordinating the claim of the Government to that of the holders of the bonds that should be issued by the companies themselves and secured by their mortgages.

Such a surrender of a security for so large a sum of money, which was payable thirty years afterward, leaving the Government practically with scarcely any security or perhaps no security at all, has no parallel in the legislation of this or any other country.

But that was not all the advantage that the companies derived from this security at all the advantage that the companies derived from this act of 1864. They derived many and most important advantages beside this surrender of the first lien of the Government upon their roads and upon their property; but it would be useless for me to take up the time of the Senate in detailing them.

Now, sir, what took place? The companies went on and built these roads, and now I affirm that if anything is capable of proof, this is capable of proof and has been proved before one committee of the Senate, proved before two committees of the House of Representatives, that the Government subsidy in land and the proceeds of the Government bonds were all-sufficient to build every mile of these roads that was built; that in point of fact not one mile of these roads was built by the expenditure of the money of individual stockholders. And now, sir, when the Government has thus in effect furnished the means to build these roads, we are told that the Government has no security in the world for the repayment of its loan, and is comno security in the world for the repayment of its loan, and is completely at the mercy of these companies whether it shall ever get one dollar of it or not. That is what we are told; for although in consideration of these great grants that were made by the act of 1864 the companies agreed that the Government should have an absolute right, not a conditional, not a limited, not a constrained, but an absolute right, to alter, to amend, or to repeal the charters, we are now told that that amounts to nothing at all, and that we can make no amendment, no alteration of these charters without the assent of the companies themselves.

amendment, no alteration of these charters without the assent of the companies themselves.

Why, Mr. President, if that is the law, then I pray gentlemen to tell me what is the use of those words in this statute at all. If you cannot add to, if you cannot alter, if you cannot amend these charters, pray what significance have those words at all? If the assent of the companies is necessary, why are the words here? Strike them out, and you might make any amendment you pleased with the assent of the companies; and if the construction is true if the law is so, that the assent of the companies is yet required as if the words were not in the act, then I say they perform no office at all.

And that brings me to notice the objection that has been made against the legality of the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. Before doing so, however, allow me once more to impress on Senators the great importance of this legislation. The amount of the bonds issued to these companies is principal, $64,623,512. They are thirty-year bonds. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided, the Court of Claims has decided, both Houses of Congress have decided, that the companies are not bound to refund to the Government the interest which the Government semi-annually pays, as it is paid by the Government, except in the mode and to the extent that is provided in these charters until the maturity of the obligation. Now, what will be the amount of the debt at the end of thirty years? If the Government should receive nothing upon these bonds toward keeping down the interest, the amount would be in round numbers $181,000,000; for the interest alone, without compounding it, would be one hundred and sixteen million three hundred and twenty-two thousand and odd dollars, which, added to the $64,623,512, would make over $181,000,000.

over $181,000,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the Senator's figures are wrong. Instead of strengthening his argument, he only weakens it.

Mr. THURMAN. Wrong in what?

Mr. MITCHELL. Wrong in the amount.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think so. I take it from the calculation that I find in Mr. Lawrence's report, who, I know, is an extremely accurate and painstaking man, and I think his calculation is right.

Mr. MITCHELL. It does not affect the argument specially.

Mr. THURMAN. It is big enough any way you can put it.

Mr. THURMAN. But there is another view, let me say to the Senator, of this subject. The Supreme Court has decided that these railroad companies are not bound to refund to the Government until the road companies are not bound to refund to the Government until the maturity of these bonds; but there is one question that they never have decided, they never have decided that when the time for refunding arrives the companies will not be bound to pay interest upon the installments of interest as the Government paid them. That is a question they never have decided at all; and, I think, when that question shall come it will be found very difficult indeed to gainsay the right of the Government to interest upon the installments of interest as it paid them; subject, of course, to any credit to which the companies may have been entitled, for the 5 per cent., the half earnings, and whatever else they may have paid. That is not compounding interest, because the interest upon each installment of interest paid by the Government would run continually without rest until the maturity of the bonds; but it will be found to add immensely to the sum which will then be due the Government and carry it far beyond $200,000,000.

Without stopping to argue that question, for it is not at all material to argue it upon the language of the fifth section of the original charter, and to which I invite the attention of the Senate, I say now, as a matter worthy of consideration, that my first impression is that when the time comes for the payment, when the thirty years shall have expired, these companies will be bound to pay not merely the principal and simple interest for thirty years on that principal but principal and simple interest for thirty years on that principal, but they will be bound to pay the principal and interest paid by the Gov-crnment and simple interest without rest upon each installment up to the time that the companies repay the allowance; and that will to the time that the companies repay the allowance; and that will add immensely, many millions, to the amount which these companies are to pay. Even allowing that the roads continue in the possession of the companies and continue to perform transportation service for the Government, and continue to pay 5 per cent. of the net earnings to the Government to keep down the Government rate, here is a claim of the Government that even under the most advantageous circumstances cannot be less at the end of thirty years than one hundred and forty-odd million dollars; and if my interpretation of this charter is right it may amount to nearly two hundred and thirty or charter is right, it may amount to nearly two hundred and thirty or two hundred and forty million dollars, and for this immense claim we are told that the Government is to have no security at all except such security as these companies ex volentia may see fit to grant. dissent utterly. It is said that that must be so because there is no right under this reserved power to alter, amend, or repeal these charters, to require anything more of these companies than is required by the acts of 1862 and 1864. In support of this it is said, and said truly, that the Government of the United States has no power to impair the obligation of a contract any more than a State would have the right to impair it. I do not deny that. A State government cannot impair the obligation of a contract. Why? For two reasons. First, I know the obligation of a contract. Why? For two reasons. First, I know of no constitution of a State that confers any such power upon a Legislature, and in regard to State Legislatures as in regard to Congress, they have only such powers as are delegated by the Constitution; but in the second place, every State is expressly prohibited by the Constitution of the United States from passing any law that will impair the obligation of a contract. Therefore no State Legislature has any such power. Congress has no such power for the simple reason that it has never been delegated to it. The Constitution has not delegated any such power; and therefore if this bill reported by the Judiciary Committee would impair the obligation of a contract, it would be a bill which we should have no authority in the world to pass, for no such power is delegated to us. But is it any such bill as that?

It has been said, further, that we have no right to destroy vested rights, and decisions have been read of courts in these very words, or words of similar import, where a reservation of right to amend, alter, words of similar import, where a reservation of right to amend, after, or repeal a charter is involved, and the courts have said there is some limitation to this power. What limitation have they put upon it? That in the exercise of the power you must not destroy vested rights that have been created under the charter, nor impair the obligation of contracts that have been created under the charter, nor impair the obligation of contracts that have been created under it. When the courts said you are not to destroy vested rights created under the charter, or impair an obligation of contracts created under it, did they mean that you are not to touch the contract between the Government and the corporation itself, its charter? No, sir, nothing of the kind; there was no such idea as that.

Mr. MITCHELL. And I did not contend for that. Mr. THURMAN. Then the Senator yields all that I ask.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the Senator yields all that I ask.
Mr. MITCHELL. Not at all.
Mr. THURMAN. They never intended it. But take the illustration of the Senator himself. If the Union Pacific Railroad Company has bought ground for a depot, it is vested in that corporation. Congress cannot amend the charter so that that land, which now belongs legally and equitably to that corporation, shall hereafter belong to Mr. MITCHELL or Mr. THURMAN. It cannot do such a thing as that any more than you can pass a law to take my dwelling-house from me without compensation and give it to my friend who sits before me. The right of property is vested in that corporation in that ground that it has acquired under and in pursuance of its charter, and Contact that the sequired under and in pursuance of its charter, and Contact the sequired under and in pursuance of its charter, and Contact the sequired under and in pursuance of its charter, and Contact the sequired under and in pursuance of its charter, and Contact the sequired under and in pursuance of its charter, and Contact the sequired under and in pursuance of its charter. The right of property is vested in that corporation in that ground that it has acquired under and in pursuance of its charter, and Congress has no right to confiscate it or take it unless it is taken for public use, and upon making due compensation therefor. So, too, if that corporation has created obligations, as it has by the millions, as it has by issuing its bonds by making a first mortgage on its road, all in pursuance of the law, we cannot, under the power, alter or impair the obligation of its contract and thus defraud its creditors. So, too, if persons have become indebted to the corporation, if they have made contracts with the corporation under which the corporation has rights, we cannot by our alteration or amendment or repeal of its charter. we cannot, by our alteration or amendment or repeal of its charter, destroy the obligation of those contracts and thus confiscate the property of the company. Nobody pretends for any such thing as that; but when it comes to the question of the contract between the Government and the company, to wit, the charter, there are but two parties to that, the Government on the one side and the corporation upon the other side. If the corporation has assented beforehand that the Government may alter that contract, its assent given beforehand is just as good as if given after an alteration.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. THURMAN. I would rather the Senator would not interrupt

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me to ask him one question right on this point, I will not interrupt him again Mr. THURMAN. Go ahead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOOTH in the chair.) Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, I will do so, although I would rather not yield.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will not interrupt the Senator again, but should like to ask one question now following up the proposition laid down by him. It being the case that there are but two parties to this contract, and one of these parties gave to the other at the time the contract was made the right to alter, amend, or repeal, has the Congress of the United States to-day, upon its own motion, for any reason, the right to pass a law taking the congressional land grant from these companies? Mr. THURMAN. What is the use of asking a question of that Mr. THURMAN. What is the use of asking a question of that kind? Where property is vested in the corporation, where its title has become perfect, is there a pretense that we can presume to divest it? The title to the land that we have thus granted has passed from the Government and vested in the corporation. That question settles nothing. I go on, therefore, with what I was saying. When a charter is passed and contains this reserved right to alter, amend, or repeal, and the company accepts the charter with that reservation in it, it is an assent beforehand on the part of the company that the Government may exercise that right although in so pany that the Government may exercise that right, although in so pany that the Government may exercise that right, although in so doing it does alter the charter or does modify it, so long at least as the general objects of the charter are observed. Certainly they have given to Congress the right to do this. Now, what say the court about it? The true principle is laid down in the case of Tomlinson vs. Jessup by the Supreme Court. The case will be found in 15 Wallace. I read from page 458:

The power reserved to the State by the law of 1841 authorized any change in the contract as it originally existed, or as subsequently modified, or its entire revoca-

And here I may say to the Senate the power reserved in that case was not one particle broader than the power that is reserved to Congress in this case.

The original corporators or subsequent stockholders took their interests with knowledge of the existence of this power, and of the possibility of its exercise at any time in the discretion of the Legislature.

Now further:

The object of the reservation, and of similar reservations in other charters, is to prevent a grant of corporate rights and privileges in a form which will preclude legislative interference with their exercise, if the public interest should at any time require such interference.

Let me read that again:

The object of the reservation, and of similar reservations in other charters, is to prevent a grant of corporate rights and privileges in a form which will preclude legislative interference with their exercise, if the public interest should at any time require such interference. It is a provision intended to preserve to the State control over its contract with the corporators.

That is what it is. It is to prevent the contract from being irreealable. It is to prevent the contract from being taken out of and from under the control of the Legislature. On the other hand, it makes it completely subject to the control of the Legislature in its discretion, so that in the exercise of its discretion it does not violate the rights that are vested under it, does not violate rights of property or impair the obligation of contracts; but as to this contract itself, this particular contract, the charter, this contract between the Government and between the corporation, the object of the provision is to leave this contract subject to the legislative will. I read again:

It is a provision intended to preserve to the State control over its contract with the corporators, which without that provision would be irrepealable, and protected from any measures affecting its obligation.

Without that it could not be affected by any measures affecting its obligation, but with this reservation its obligation may be affected. That is the meaning of what is here said by the Supreme Court of the United States. Your committee, in commenting on this case, say :

United States. Your committee, in commenting on this case, say:

This decision places the reservation upon its true ground. It gives to the Legislature the right to interfere when the public interests require interference. It preserves to the State control over its contract with the corporators, and the latter, by accepting the charter, agree in advance that such control shall exist. No one will deny that if the bill now reported should become a law and be assented to by said railroad corporations, it would thenceforth be binding upon them. But their acceptance of their charter, containing the reservations aforesaid, is an assent beforehand to the bill now proposed, or to any similar measure that Congress in its discretion shall deem necessary for the protection of the Government or the creditors of said corporations.

Citing Pennsylvania College cases, 13 Wallace, pages 213 and 214: In this latter case the court spoke of the reserved right to alter or amend a charreservation to the State to make any alterations in the charter which the Legislature in its wisdom may deem fit, just, and expedient to enact.

I use the very language of the court-

No language could be broader than that as to our power. First, I ought to refer to the case of Sherman vs. Smith, I Black, 593. That was a case that came from the State of New York. That was a case in which the Legislature of New York imposed very heavy obligations upon the stockholders in a corporation, greater than those that existed at the time the charter was granted; and yet the highest court in New York and the Supreme Court of the United States, I believe by a unanimous vote of both courts, sustained that act as constitutional and within the competency of the Legislature, the power of repeal, alteration, and amendment having been reserved to the Legislature of that State.

But I want to speak still further of the scope of our power under this reserved provision. In Miller vs. The State, 15 Wallace, 498, the Supreme Court said:

Power to legislate, founded upon such a reservation in a charter to a private corporation, is certainly not without limit, and it may well be admitted that it cannot be exercised to take away or destroy rights acquired by virtue of such char-

That is, the rights conferred on a corporation by the charter and rights that have been acquired under and by virtue of the charter, as I have already illustrated—

If have already intestated—and which by a legitimate use of the powers granted have become vested in the corporation, but it may be safely affirmed that the reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant or to secure the due administration of its affairs so as to protect the rights of its stockholders and of creditors, and for the proper disposition of the assets.

Now, sir, I want nothing more than that to sustain this bill. Now, sir, I want nothing more than that to sustain this bill. The Supreme Court say that this power may be exercised to almost any extent to secure the due administration of its affairs, "that is, the affairs of the corporation." That is one object of the bill of the Judiciary Committee. Again, "or to protect the rights of its stockholders and of creditors." That is another object of this bill. Again, the contract is "for the proper disposition of its assets;" and that is the third object of this bill. The bill does not go one hair's breadth beyond the accomplishment of these objects, which your Supreme Court said in the most emphatic words it is competent for us to provide for. Again, in Holyoke vs. Lyman (15 Wallace, 500) the court held that—

The provision of the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts, chapter 44, section 23, and General Statutes, chapter 63, section 41, declaring that acts of incorporation shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal at the pleasure of the Legislature, reserves to the Legislature the authority to make any alteration or amendment of a charter granted subject to it, which will not defeat or substantially impair the object of the grant or any rights vested under it, and which the Legislature may deem necessary to secure either that object or other public or private rights.

What more can we want than that to justify this legislation? The whole argument against it and the cases which have been cited in support of that argument go upon a total misconception of what the courts mean. When they speak of vested rights they do not speak of the franchises granted by the charter; they speak of property acquired by the corporation, contracts made by third persons with the corporation. They do not speak of that contract between the Government and the corporation which is called its charter. It is enough to say in reference to that, that we may go to almost any extent to secure the due administration of the affairs of the corporation, to protect its creditors, and to provide for the disposition of its assets, and that it is an assent given beforehand by the corporation when it accepted the charter that that discretion shall rest with the Legislature, and that it shall continue and maintain its control over the contract, and the contract shall not therefore be considered irrepealable or not subject to modification.

It is said that the power to alter, amend, or repeal in the act of 1862 is a limited power and can only be exercised really for the benefit of the company. But then it is admitted that the reserved power in the act of 1864 is as broad and unlimited as words can make it. Then it is said that these statutes being in pari materia, as I admit for most purposes, they ought to be so considered, because absolutely nothing was done until after the act of 1864 was passed in the execution of this work. It is said that the first provisions in regard to repeal must limit this second. In other words, the very singular statement is made that the first expression of the legislative intent is to govern its last expression of intention. Sir, that is not the way that I read statutes. I read statutes, that the last expression of the legislative intent, if it is inconsistent with the previous expression, overrules that previous expression. When I come to look at the facts connected with this legislation; when I come to see the immense benefits conwith this legislation; when I come to see the immense benefits conferred upon these corporations by this act of 1864; when I come to reflect upon the immense surrender of the rights of the Government by the act of 1864; when I see that it gave up so much and conferred so much, I can well see that after paying such a consideration as that Congress should reserve to itself the power to amend, to alter, or to repeal these acts. Why, Mr. President, just think for one moment that under the act of 1862 the Government had a first lien on these roads, and all their property, and it might be then that with such a first lien, a limited power to alter, amend, or repeal would suffice for the protection of the Government; but when the Government gave up that first lien, when it agreed to be a subordinate lien-holder, when it agreed that many millions, nay, many tens of millions, nay, a hunit agreed that many millions, nay, many tens of millions, nay, a hundred millions of securities might be issued by these companies and made a paramount lien on the roads, and the Government was thus left in effect without any security at all except the watchfulness of Congress, was there not good reason why then the Government should reserve to itself an unlimited power to alter, to amend, or to repeal these charters?

Sir, undoubtedly these were the considerations that moved Congress to insist upon this unlimited power of alteration, amendment, or repeal; and the companies consented to it and were glad to consent to it, for they were getting the greatest bargain that ever corporations obtained from any government on the face of this earth.

So much, sir, for the legal question involved, and now I proceed to compare these two bills. The Judiciary Committee has reported a bill which I will briefly explain.

The first section of that bill defines what shall be considered net earnings of these companies. Was there any necessity for that definition? The Railroad Committee seem to think not, for they make no definition in their bill. It is admitted that the Government and the companies disagree most materially as to what constitute net earnings, and yet the Railroad Committee report no definition whatsoever of what shall constitute net earnings.

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator allow me just to say there that the reason it did not report upon that was because the Senator's own constitute that on the indicious properties that a star indicious report and and had executed into a law.

committee, that on the judiciary, reported and had enacted into a law in 1874 that the definition of the 5 per cent. should be left to the adjudication of the courts of the United States, where it now rests.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, sir, when we are providing a measure that shall protect this Government, and which we have the right to do under the power to alter or amend this law, I for one am not willing to wait for the tedious process of litigation. It would be no objection to me to the first section of this bill if the Supreme Court were to decide to-day that the company's interpretation of "net earnings" is the true interpretation. All I should have to say to that would be then there is so much the more necessity for this legislation to secure the Government. That would be all I should have to say in reply to

But, sir, the importance of this is perfectly manifest. What is it these companies do? They claim that the net earnings of the roads are only what remains after paying the running expenses and paying the interest upon the bonded debt, and the Senator from Oregon yesterday spoke of some courts as deciding that that was the true rule. But what was his case? It was the case of a preferred stockholder, a holder of preferred stock, in a company; and does not the Senator know very well that it is a fixed rule of law that stockholders of a company can receive no dividends until its debts are paid, and that the decision which was perfectly correct in that case has not the least application in the world to this? There the holder of preferred stock undertook to make money which belonged to the creditors of the company; and the only wonder is that he had the audacity to make such a claim in the face of the known law of corporations, which is, "pay your debts first before you distribute profits among yourselves." That has no application in a case like this. The language of this statute is too plain, I submit, to admit of controversy, that the net earnings mean the gross earnings less the operating expenses excluding from consideration the interest upon the debt; and not only that, this definition is necessary for another purpose, to prevent that fraud so often perpetrated by railroad corporations of putting into the account of their operating expenses charges and expenses that really belong to the construction account of the road. That is a thing which has been done time and again, and which your Judiciary a thing which has been done time and again, and which your Judiciary Committee intended these companies should not do; that we should take the net earnings, as the words fairly import, and not allow them to swallow up all their earnings and deprive the Government of the 5 per cent. to which it is entitled, by saying, "We have expended this money of which you ought to have 5 per cent. in the purchase of other roads, in the leasing of other roads, in the building of more wiles of road and there is nothing left from which the Government. miles of road, and there is nothing left from which the Government can get its 5 per cent."

I do not think it necessary that I should say anything more on that subject. I invite the closest scrutiny to the first section of the bill that defines "net earnings," and if any one can point out anything that is erroneous in it, I shall be one of the very first to thank him for doing so. Then the second section provides:

That the whole amount of compensation which may from time to time be due to said several railroad companies respectively for services rendered for the Government shall be retained by the United States, one-half theroof to be presently applied to the liquidation of the interest paid and to be paid by the United States upon the bonds so issued by it as aforesaid, to each of said corporations severally, and the other half thereof to be turned into the sinking fund hereinafter provided, for the uses therein mentioned.

The only alteration that this section makes in existing law is that it requires one-half of this transportation account, as we call it for brevity and convenience, to be turned into a sinking fund. The other half is applicable under existing law precisely as it is under this section of the bill. Of course there is an alteration in this char-ter, but it is an alteration in the contract between each of these companies and the Government, which we under this reserved power have a right to make. It does not defeat or even tend to defeat the general purposes of the charter; it does not impair the ability of the company to carry on its work and to pay its debts.

Mr. MORTON. What is done with the money earned by the companies in transportation for the Government?

Mr. THURMAN. I have already said that under the existing law was helf of the transportation account as we call it—that is the account as we call it—that is the account.

one-half of the transportation account, as we call it-that is, the account of the companies against the Government for transporting troops and supplies and munitions and things of that kind-is reserved by the Government and applied to keep down the interest on the bonds which the Government has loaned.

Mr. MITCHELL. The other half is paid absolutely to the com-

Mr. THURMAN. The other half is paid to the company as the law provides. This bill leaves the half which is to be paid to keep down interest precisely as the law now stands; but it requires the other half to go into the sinking fund. It does not deprive the company of the remaining half; it does not confiscate it; it does not take it away from them. It only requires that it shall be put into a sinking fund for the payment of the debts of the company in the order of their priority when the time shall come; and thus it simply authorizes us to do what in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States we may do under this reserved power, to wit: that we may amend this charter "to secure the due administration of its affairs so as it protect the rights of its stockholders and of creditors and for the proper disposition of its assets." It is an exercise of that power which the highest court in this land has said we fully and completely pos-

Then, sir, we come to the third and fourth sections. In respect to this fourth section I beg the particular attention of Senators, because I find that owing to the peculiar wording of the section it has been greatly misunderstood.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Senator passes to that, will be allow me to ask a question about another matter?

Mr. THURMAN. I should rather that the Senator would let me go on. The third section only provides in general terms that there shall be a sinking fund established in the Treasury. Then comes the operative section, the fourth.

Mr. WEST. Before the Senator passes from that, as no doubt the Senate wants information, and I am sure I do, will he be good enough to explain what is intended by that third section, whether it is intended to be a compounding-interest fund or not?

Mr. THURMAN. A compounding-interest tund or not?

Mr. THURMAN. A compounding-interest sum?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. THURMAN. If this section does not explain itself it is because the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who is usually supposed to have one of the clearest heads in the Senate, cannot draw a section. He drew it and I think it is plain enough.

Mr. WEST. If it is so easily explained will the Senator be kind enough to explain it?

Mr. THURMAN. I will. It is—

That there shall be established in the Treasury of the United States a sinking fund which shall be invested in bonds of the United States.

Is there any ambiguity about that?

and the semi-annual income thereof shall be in like manner from time to time invested.

Is there any obscurity about that? When these companies have put $3,000,000, we will suppose in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of this sinking fund, the Secretary of the Treasury is required to invest these three millions in bonds of the United States. The interest on those bonds will be payable semi-annually, and when a semi-annual installment of interest accrues then he is required to take that semi-annual interest and invest it in bonds again, and so on from time to time.

Mr. WEST. And whom does that secondary investment go to the credit off

Mr. THURMAN. It goes to the credit of the sinking fund.
Mr. WEST. That is what we wanted to know.
Mr. THURMAN. Certainly it does.
Mr. EDMUNDS. "In like manner" is the language.

Mr. THURMAN-

And the same shall accumulate and be disposed of-

Now I beg the attention of the Senator from Louisiana-

And be disposed of as hereinafter mentioned.

When the Senator comes to find what is "hereinafter mentioned," he will find that that sinking fund is to be distributed to the creditors of the companies, precisely as a chancellor would have to marshal the assets and distribute them, giving no priority to the United States; not violating the right of any creditor who has any lien superior to that of the United States, as the Senator from Oregon, if I understood him correctly, intimated yesterday; but, on the contrary, religiously preserving the priority of lien, so that those who have liens that are paramount to the United States shall be first paid out of the sinking fund if they are not otherwise to be paid. And here I might remark, in passing, that it is one of the vices of the Railroad Committee's bill that it does flagrant wrong to the mortgage-bond-holders of these in passing, that it is one of the vices of the Railroad Committee's bill that it does flagrant wrong to the mortgage-bond-holders of these roads; for it creates a sinking fund for the benefit of the United States alone, and thus takes the assets of the companies upon which the mortgage-bond-holders have the first lien and confiscates them to the use of the Government. That is exactly what the Railroad Committee's bill does. Our bill does no such thing; for it provides that these exacts shall be warphaled and distributed in precisely the mode than assets shall be marshaled and distributed in precisely the mode they would be by a court of equity; distributing them according to the respective priorities of the parties.

But section 4 has been misunderstood. Let me state in brief what it is. It requires that these companies shall pay in to the credit of this sinking fund 25 per cent. of their net earnings; that in computing what are their net earnings, you are to take into the account the 5 per cent. which they are now bound to pay of those net earnings. That is the first factor in the calculation. Next, you are to take the entire transportation account of the Government. That is the second factor. Then to those two sums is to be added a sum which will That is the first factor in the calculation. Next, you are to take the entire transportation account of the Government. That is the second factor. Then to those two sums is to be added a sum which will make 25 per cent. of the net carnings of the companies for the preceding year. But if that 25 per cent, should exceed in respect to the Central Pacific Railroad the sum of $1,500,000, the company shall not be compelled to pay the whole 25 per cent, to the credit of the sinking fund, but shall pay only the $1,500,000. If the 25 per cent, thus computed is less than a million and a half, the company pays only the lesser amount, and does not pay the million and a half. I wish Senators to understand this, because owing to the peculiar structure of its phraseology it has been misunderstood. The sums named here, a million and a half for the Central Pacific, a million and a half for the Union Pacific, and the like, are simply mentioned as maximum sums, the maximum which these companies shall be compelled to pay to the credit of the sinking fund. This is not a requirement that they shall pay that much, but that they shall not be compelled to pay more than that. That is what it means. If the 25 per cent, of profits of each does not amount to the sum named for it, then it does not have to pay such amount; and that includes the 5 per cent, and that includes the whole transportation account. I say again, if the 25 per cent, exceeds the sum named, they are not obliged to pay the that includes the whole transportation account. I say again, if the 25 per cent. exceeds the sum named, they are not obliged to pay the 25 per cent., but only the named sum. If the 25 per cent., computed as I have stated, is less than the sum named, then they are only obliged to pay what it amounts to, though it is less than the sum named, and are not compelled to pay the sum named.

Then follows the next section. There is a provision that, if it shalt be made to appear by any one of these companies to the Secretary of the Treasury that it has been compelled to use more than 75 per cent. of its net earnings in the nayment of its interest, so that it is not the Treasury that it has been compelled to use more than 75 per cent. of its net earnings in the payment of its interest, so that it is not able to pay this 25 per cent., he may for that year make an abatement according to the amount taken of the 25 per cent. actually necessary to the discharge of its interest, thus securing the creditors of the company against any possibility that this bill can take from them moneys to which under the existing law they are entitled, and thus securing the companies against any default in the payment of their interest which might result in a foreclosure of their mortgages and a sale of their roads. Nothing could be fairer.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me suggest to my colleague that there is, I think, some ambiguity in the language here. I will give my colleague the actual sum submitted to us, to see if it does not create some trouble. The net earnings of the Central Pacific road, according to its report, are $8,021,498, and 25 per cent. of that, as a matter of course, is over $2,000,000. If I understand this bill, the 25 per cent. need not be paid unless it is less than the amount of $1,500,000, and with certain other sums added.

Mr. THURMAN. It must be paid up to that amount.

Mr. THURMAN. It must be paid up to that amount.
Mr. SHERMAN. Let me read, because I am very much in favor of the object of this bill, and I want to see that it is made so clear that in its practical operation there will be no difficulty or confusion:

That there shall be carried to the credit of the said fund, on the 1st day of February in each year, the one-half of the compensation for services hereinbefore named, rendered for the Government by said Central Pacific Railroad Company, not applied in liquidation of interest.

How much is that, I would ask my colleague? I think it is about two hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. THURMAN. That is one of the just complaints against these companies about which I am going to speak. The Secretary of the Treasury reported to the committee of the Honse that, owing to the failure of these companies to do what their charter requires, to give their net earnings, he had found it impossible to state. If you take the reports of the directors of the companies, those to their stockholders, you will find this stated for the year 1875: Union Pacific net earnings, $6,148,365; 5 per cent. of which would be in round numbers, $307,000; Central Pacific net earnings, eight million and odd dollars, 5 per cent. of which would be $401,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. My colleague does not understand me. What is "the one-half of the compensation?"

Mr. THURMAN. The transportation account.

Mr. SHERMAN. How much is that ordinarily?

Mr. THURMAN. That is a variable quantity.

Mr. WEST. I think the Senator will find it correctly compiled on pages 4 and 5 of the report of the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. THURMAN. The annual amount is estimated by the Committee on Railroads at $320,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I will come to the point I am at. This provides—

The there shall be corried to the reality of the still find on the Let langer.

That there shall be carried to the credit of the said fund, on the 1st day of February in each year, the one-half of the compensation for services hereinbefore named, rendered for the Government by said Central Pacific Railroad Company, not applied in liquidation of interest—

That I understand is $325,000.

Mr. THURMAN. Three hundred and twenty thousand dollars, I think; perhaps more than that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

And in addition thereto the said company shall, on said day in each year, pay into the Treasury, to the credit of said sinking fund, the sum of $1,500,000—

That is the total, the $320,000 and the $1,500,000; and now there is a deduction-or so much thereof as shall be necessary to make the 5 per cent. of the net earnings of its said road payable to the United States under said act of 1862, and the whole sum carned by it as compensation for services rendered for the United States, together with the sum by this section required to be paid, amount in the aggregate to 25 per cent. of the whole net earnings of said railroad company, ascertained and defined as hereinbefore provided, for the year ending on the 31st day of December next preceding.

As I understand this, there are two sums to be paid into the sink-As I understand this, there are two sums to be paid into the sinking fund; one is the one-half of the amount due for services rendered the Government, that is, $320,000, and then there is an additional sum of one and a half million dollars, subject, however, to the deduction named in the closing paragraph of the section.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my colleague allow me to explain that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I want it explained. I wish to comprehend it.

Mr. THURMAN. Perhaps this language would have been a little more perspicuous if it had given the elements which go to make the 25 per cent., and then provided that where the 25 per cent. should exceed the million and a half for the Central Pacific, it should not be required to have in any one year more than a million and a half.

required to have in any one year more than a million and a half. That is exactly what the section means.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I understand, but I say there is ambiguity. I agree with my colleague that to strike out all that and allow them to pay into the sinking fund the $320,000, the one-half of the sum due for services, which is a variable sum but which will be fixed every year, and this million and a half besides, would provide a fixed sum of $1,800,000 for the sinking fund. That is about

Mr. THURMAN. No, we do not intend to have them pay more than a million and a half for any year, but I must leave to the Senator from Vermont, who drew this bill, to defend his own language.

Now let me put it in figures, I will take the Central Pacific. The gross transportation account, the whole of it, was $320,000.

gross transportation account, the whole of it, was $320,000.

Mr. WEST. The Senator is mistaken there.

Mr. THURMAN. How much?

Mr. WEST. Three hundred and fifty-one thousand five hundred and twenty-three dollars and twelve cents.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well, $351,000. That is one factor. Then 5 per cent. of the net earnings, that is $401,000, according to the report of the company itself. You have there $752,000. Now suppose 25 per cent. of the net earnings of the company amount to more than a million and a half, instead of taking the whole 25 per cent. of net earnings, you add to the $752,000 such a sum as will make a million and a half of dollars, so that you do not require them in any year to pay more than the million and a half. But suppose that the net earnings of the company are such that, when you have taken these two sums together, they would not have to pay, in order to make 25 per cent. of their net earnings, $1,500,000; then they do not have to pay $1,500,000, but only such sum as will make 25 per cent. of their net earnings, computed as I have stated.

It is all perfectly plain. But take this 5 per cent. of their net earnings. That would be one factor. That is a part of their net earnings; and it is, therefore, proper to consider in considering what is 25 per cent. of their net earnings. Then take the transportation account. Is not that part of the net earnings if out of their usual earnings they have paid their expenses to move it? So that is properly a factor in fixing this 25 per cent. of the net earnings. Then, taking these two elements together, you add such a sum to them as will make 25 per cent. of their net earnings, provided that sum does not exceed in the case of the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific a million and a half dollars each. dollars each.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my colleague will allow me, I agree with him Mr. SHERMAN. If my colleague will allow me, I agree with him entirely in his general idea; but is it not much more simple, so that everybody can understand it, to say that these railroad companies should pay 25 per cent. of their net earnings, as defined by him, provided, however, that the amount they shall be required to pay in any one year shall not exceed a million and a half of dollars? That is a simple proposition that everybody will understand. Now 25 per cent. of the net earnings of the Central Pacific is $2,000,000. They ought not to pay that much to the Government, because that is more than the interest we pay for the company. the interest we pay for the company.

Mr. BOGY. The 25 per cent. includes the 5 per cent. and the trans-

Mr. BOGY. The 25 per cent. includes the 5 per cent. and the transportation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean that they shall not in any case be required to pay more than 25 per cent. The 25 per cent. may amount to more than a million and a half, but they shall not be required to pay in any year more than the interest the Government pays. I suppose that is the meaning really.

Mr. THURMAN. We do not require them to pay as much as the interest, because we thought we had better err a little on the side of mercy than to require them to pay the full amount of the interest and trust to better times hereafter and an increased business of the roads to enable them to fulfill their obligations. But. Mr. President. and trust to better times hereafter and an increased business of the roads to enable them to fulfill their obligations. But, Mr. President, it may be that the form, the phraseology, suggested by my colleague would be clearer than that in the bill; but I must leave him to suggest that to the Senator from Vermont who drew the bill, and who is so great a master of clear and precise language, as we know that he is; and he, no doubt, if he gets his mind upon it, will be able to give the reason which made him prefer this form of phraseology. I am not speaking about words; I only go for the substance.

Now, Mr. President, are these sums reasonable sums—a million and a half for the Central Pacific—that is the outside, and 25 per cent. of their net earnings, I will say, always exceed that sum, so that they will not have to pay the 25 per cent.; and the same as to the Union Pacific; and the same in respect to the other roads which pay the smaller sums? It will be found that the amount of interest which the Government pays annually for these companies exceeds the amount Government pays annually for these companies exceeds the amount which we require of them. You will find on page 2 of the report of the Judiciary Committee the following statement:

Your committee has fixed upon these maximum sums with reference to the amount of interest which the Government annually pays, or may be liable to pay, upon the bonds issued by it for the benefit of said companies, respectively. These annual payments of interest by the Government are about as follows:

On bonds issued for the benefit of said Central and Western Pacific Railroad Companies, $1,671,340.80—

Which is $171,340 more than we require that company to pay annually into the sinking fund—on bonds issued for the benefit of said Union Pacific Railroad Company, $1,634,

Which is $134,190 more than we require that company to payon bonds issued for the benefit of said Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, $96,000—

Which is considerably more than the amount that corporation has to pay into the sinking fund—on bonds issued for the benefit of said Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, $97,699.23—

We require that company to pay $100,000-on bonds issued for the benefit of the said Kansas Pacific Railroad Company, $378,180.

We require it to pay $350,000. So that in every instance except that of the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, the amount which we require to be paid is less than the annual interest-charge paid by the Government; and in the case of the Central Branch Union Pacific the amounts are substantially the same.

Now, Mr. President, I pass from the fourth section of the bill. I have already explained the fifth section, which provides that when it is made to appear to the Secretary of the Treasury that the companies, without default in their interest on the obligations which are a first lien on the roads, cannot pay the sum required, he is authorized for the time being to make an abatement.

Then the sixth section provides—

That no dividend shall be voted, made, or paid for or to any stockholder or stock-

That no dividend shall be voted, made, or paid for or to any stockholder or stockholders in either of said companies respectively at any time when the said company shall be in default in respect of the payment either of the sums required as aforesaid to be paid into said sinking fund, or in respect of the payment of the said 5 per cent. of the net earnings, or in respect of interest upon any debt the lien of which, or of the debt on which it may accrue, is paramount to that of the United States.

And makes it a penalty in the directors to pay, or the stockholders to receive, any dividend in violation of the act. Certainly no one can dispute the propriety of that; certainly no one is here to say that these shareholders shall divide up the earnings of those roads among themselves, leaving their creditors unpaid. This bill does nothing more than a court of equity would do. Any court of equity would enjoin any such dividend, if any company should attempt to make one, leaving its debts unpaid. There is no new principle in that, but it is a most necessary and salutary provision to enforce the provisions of the act; and the omission of any such provision in the bill of the Railroad Committee is, in my judgment, a most serious defect in that bill.

Then comes the seventh section:

That the said sinking fund so established and accumulated shall, at the maturity of said bonds so respectively issued by the United States, be applied to the payment and satisfaction thereof, according to the interest and proportion of each of said companies in said fund, and of all interest paid by the United States thereon, and not re-imbursed, subject to the provisions of the next section.

Then comes section 8. These two sections, 7 and 8, are to be read

That said sinking fund so established and accumulated shall, according to the interest and proportion of said companies respectively therein, be held for the protection, security, and benefit of the lawful and just holders of any mortgage or lien debts of such companies respectively, lawfully paramount to the rights of the United States, and for the claims of other creditors, if any, lawfully chargeable upon the funds so required to be paid into said sinking fund, according to their respective lawful priorities, as well as for the United States, according to their respective lawful priorities, as well as for the United States, according to their respective lawful priorities, as well as for the united States, according to the principles of equity, to the end that all persons having any claim upon said sinking fund may be entitled thereto in due order; but the provisions of this section shall not operate or be held to impair any existing legal right, except in the manner in this act provided, of any mortgage, lien, or other creditor of any of said companies respectively; nor to excuse any of said companies respectively from the duty of discharging, out of other funds, its debts to any creditor except the United States.

The transmission of the Admitship of the funds is respectively.

That provision for the distribution of that fund is precisely what any court of equity would make if the distribution were in its hands.

Mr. BOGY. I ask if under this section the fund accumulated in the any court of equity would make if the distribution were in its hands.

Mr. BOGY. I ask if under this section the fund accumulated in the sinking fund could be used to pay the liens on the road prior to the Government's lien?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly, and must be so applied. The whole of this bill, from first to last, most scrupulously guards the rights of the creditors of these corporations and gives priority, according to priority of lien, in the distribution of these funds; so that this bill, if it passes, instead of being being injurious to the bondholders of these companies, will have a most material effect really in helping to secure their bonds and the prompt payment thereof. It is a thing that, instead of doing any harm to any creditor of the companies, provides a means for his payment and gives him a right to payment exactly according to his legal and technical priority.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose 75 per cent. of the net earnings is not sufficient to meet the interest on these bonds, what then?

Mr. THURMAN. I have already told the Senator again and again that, if it is not, section 5 provides for that very case. Section 5, when that is made to appear to the Secretary of the Treasury, allows him to make an abatement of the sum to be paid into the sinking fund so as to credit each company with the amount that it has been compelled to apply toward the payment of its interest, so as to prevent any default of the company in the payment of its interest and any possibility of giving rise to a case for the foreclosure of its mortagage.

The tenth section simply makes it the duty of the Attorney-General to enforce this act. Then comes the eleventh section, to which the Senator from Oregon takes great exception:

That if any of said several railroad companies shall fail to perform all and singular the requirements of this act and of the acts hereinbefore mentioned, and of any other act relating to said company, to be by it performed, for the period of six months next after such performance may be due, such failure shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights, privileges, grants, and franchises derived or obtained by it from the United States; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to cause such forfeiture to be judicially enforced.

I confess I was a little surprised to hear this section spoken of as onerous and oppressive upon the railroad companies. The truth of it is it is directly the reverse. Here are cases of forfeiture of this charter that might be enforced instantaneously after the cause of forfeiture occurred. Proceedings might be instituted the moment the cause of forfeiture occurred as the law now stands.

Mr. MITCHELL. The trouble is that it provides new cases of forfeiture.

feiture. Mr. THURMAN. I know it provides new cases of forfeiture. The new cases of forfeiture that it provides are the cases mentioned in this act. If they do not live up to and perform the requirements of this act, that is made cause of forfeiture. I will speak about the case that is illustrated by the last section of the act of 1862 presently; and I say to the Senator that a failure by the companies to make the returns therein provided for is cause of forfeiture, and ought to be. It is now and ought to be forever as long as these corporations have an existence and owe obligations to the Government, or any have an existence and owe obligations to the Government, or any part of them under which the companies are now liable. What is this twentieth section of the act of 1862, which the Senator read and commented upon, and which he says might be broken by these companies, and they incur a forfeiture on account of doing it?

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the corporation hereby created and the roads connected therewith, under the provisions of this act, shall make to the Secretary of the Treasury an annual report, wherein shall be set forth—

First. The names of the stockholders and their places of residence, so far as the same can be ascertained;

Second. The names and residences of the directors and all other officers of the company;

Third. The amount of stock subscribed, and the amount thereof actually paid

Third. The amount of stock subscribed, and the amount thereof actually paid in;

Fourth. A description of the lines of road surveyed, of the lines thereof fixed upon for the construction of the road, and the cost of such surveys;

Fifth. The amount received from passengers on the road;

Sixth. The amount received for freight thereon;

Seventh. A statement of the expense of said road and its fixtures;

Eighth. A statement of the indebtedness of said company, setting forth the various kinds thereof. Which report shall be sworn to by the president of the said company, and shall be presented to the Secretary of the Treasury on or before the 1st day of July in each year.

Are those immaterial matters? I will not stop to discuss the importance of each and every of them, although there is not one single requirement there that is not important, as I could easily show. But take the last three, which are intended to require each company to make a sworn statement to the Government, so that the Government may know that it gets its 5 per cent. of the net earnings of the road; and now what is the fact? Here are these companies under this obligation—these companies who have received such immense subsidies from the Government in lands and in bonds, who never to this day have complied with that section of the law; and the Government cannot tell you to-day what are the net earnings of these railroad companies. I hold the proof in my hand.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Ohio will not understand me as having contended that they should not incur forfeiture there. The question I was trying to argue was this: that inasmuch as there is no forfeiture in the original act—I do not understand that there is; the Senator says he thinks there is—then the question arises, have we now power to declare a forfeiture for a failure to perform a duty required of these parties by the original act, against which no forfeiture was declared?

Mr. THURMAN. My friend cannot have read the corporation law lately, although I can hardly say that of him because he reads so much law and reads it so diligently. Does not the Senator know that it does not require that you should put in an act of incorporation the penalty of forfeiture in order to enforce forfeiture? The only question that has ever arisen is this: If you have put in some other penalty have you not thereby negatived the idea of forfeiting the characteristics. alty have you not thereby negatived the idea of forfeiting the charter? Take, for instance, the national-bank act. You put in a provision there that if a bank takes more than lawful interest it shall forfeit the interest. If that were not there, and it took more than lawful interest, it would forfeit the charter. But the question arises, having provided a specific punishment for that particular offense, can the greater punishment of forfeiture of the charter be imposed? I take it to be the universal law of corporations, that if a corporation violates its charter the Government has a right to have it declared forfeited by indical process, and it is not for the corporation to say that feited by judicial process, and it is not for the corporation to say that letted by judicial process, and it is not for the corporation to say that any one of the requirements of the charter is insignificant or of no moment, is frivolous or the like. It is very true there might be some from which it would not be inferred that the Government intended to enforce a forfeiture. It might be so, but it is not for the corporation to say, "I have a right to violate this provision of the charter because I think it is immaterial or frivolous," but certainly it must be admitted that wherever a corporation violates or fails to keep a material provision of its charter that moment it forfeits its charter, and the Government may cause the fact of forfeiture to be indicially material provision of its charter that moment it forfeits its charter, and the Government may cause the fact of forfeiture to be judicially ascertained, and the judgment of ouster pronounced against it.

Mr. MITCHELL. What does the Senator say about section 16 of the act of 1864, where a penalty is fixed? I understand the Senator to say that where the penalty had been fixed then it was a doubtful question whether forfeiture could be imposed.

Mr. THURMAN. Beyond all doubt it is. Where a penalty is fixed then it is always a question whether the Legislature intended to impose any greater negative in the particular case or whether it has then it is always a question whether the Legislature intended to impose any greater penalty in that particular case, or whether it has exhausted all its power of punishment in that particular case. I have only to say this about that matter, that if there is such a case in this original act, or in the act of 1864, then this act goes further, as we have a perfect right to do, and says there shall be a higher punishment inflicted upon you than that which is provided for, to wit, a forfeiture of the charter if the Government sees fit to enforce it. That we have a right to say, and it is time for us to say it, in my judgment, in respect to these corporations.

Mr. President, I believe I have now gone through with all the provisions of this bill: and although I am speaking much longer than I expected to and much longer than I wanted to, I wish to notice the bill introduced by my honorable friend from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] and last reported by the Railroad Committee. I want to point out to the Senate the differences between that bill and the Judiciary Com-

In the first place the bill of the Judiciary Committee defines what shall be net earnings; the Railroad Committee bill contains no such definition. I have already remarked on that; I have shown the necessity for the definition; and therefore I submit that the Judiciary Committee bill, which contains that definition and which I submit is applies the whole amount up to December 31, 1876, to the sinking fund, and thus deprives the Government of the present payment to which it is confessedly entitled by the charter. If the bill of the Railroad Committee should pass, then instead of this half of the transportation account being applied to keep down the interest, being applied by the Government immediately to the payment of the interest, it goes into the sinking fund account to be applied for twenty-odd years to come. One of the great grievances really that exist in respect to this legislation is that the Government is not repaid the semi-annual installments of interest as it pays them. That you know has been a subject of great debate in this Chamber, and in the other House, and it finally went to the Supreme Court of the United States for decision. That court was compelled, under the language of these charcision. That court was compelled, under the language of these charters, to say that the companies were not bound to re-imburse the Government from time to time as it paid interest. The consequence is the Government loses interest upon the interest which it pays, and the interest which it thus loses upon the interest which it pays, and the interest which it thus loses upon the interest which it pays, unless my interpretation of the act that I cited sometime ago is incorrect, will amount to as much as the whole principal of these bonds, as much as the whole $64,000,000. Is this evil to be aggravated and even this little amount to as much as the whole principal of these bonds, as much as the whole $64,000,000. Is this evil to be aggravated and even this little pittance, this half of the transportation account, these half earnings of the company in its work for the Government, which it is now sought to re-imburse the Government for, as it pays the interest, also to be kept for the benefit of the companies, invested for them with semi-annual interest at 6 per cent. a year, and they given from twenty to thirty years before that money is thus applied which the Government has a right to apply at this moment to the liquidation of the interest which it has paid for them?

But, sir, the worst feature of all in the Railroad Committee bill is to be found in its section 3. After providing that these companies shall pay—for it only applies to two, the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific—each of them the sum of $750,000 per annum, in semi-annual installments, toward a sinking fund, (a sum which I will show, if I have the strength to do it, before I am done, is less than they are bound to pay now, or less than they will be bound to pay the moment there is any revival of business in the country under the laws that now exist,) it allows, upon its paying this sum of three-quarters of a million a year—a company like the Central Pacific, that has paid 8 per cent. dividends to its stockholders and that is making eight million dollars of net profits every year, and a company like the Union Pacific that it is making eight million dollars of net profits every year, and a company like the Union ion dollars of net profits every year, and a company like the Union Pacific, that is making from six to seven million dollars net profits every year, and which after allowing all these immense profits has paid three-quarters of a million of dollars to the Government each year, -then what says this bill of the Railroad Committee ? I read sec-

That the payments so to be made by said companies shall be in lieu of all payments or other requirements from said companies under said act, and the amendments thereto, in relation to the re-imbursement to the Government of the bonds so issued to said corporations.

What is in that meal-tub? They are bound now to repay the Government at the end of the thirty years—that is to say, in 1898—and this section gives them as much time to repay as it will take at the this section gives them as much time to repay as it will take at the rate of three-quarters of a million for each company per annum. I undertake to say that, if my construction of the amount which these companies are bound to pay is the correct one, there is no child now born who will live long enough to see that debt paid under this bill of the Railroad Committee. Take the amount of $64,000,000 with simple interest upon it alone. The interest amounts, as we see, to three million dollars and upward a year. The interest to be paid simple interest upon it alone. The interest amounts, as we see, to three million dollars and upward a year. The interest to be paid for these companies amounts to upward of $3,000,000 a year; and these companies are to pay $1,500,000 a year, not half the interest; and that is to go on until the whole debt is paid. Why, sir, it goes on to eternity. I said there was no child born that would see it paid. No, sir; there never will be, though he should be born six million years from now. In the very nature of things it cannot be. How, in God's name, can a payment of $1,500,000 a year ever pay this debt when the annual interest on it is $3,000,000? Yet that is this bill. It just wipes out the obligation of the company to pay at the end of thirty years and says, "Pay half the interest that accrues on these bonds, and just so long as you pay half the interest that accrues on these bonds the Government will not give you the least trouble in the world." I cannot think that that provision in this bill was ever comprehended by my learned friends. I know their ability; I know their disposition to see that justice is done to the Government; but I know another thing, that this subject is one that requires long and careful study, and that he who undertakes to frame a bill upon it without long and careful study, and without familiarity with all its details, will necessarily fall into some error like this. If there be nothing else that ought to kill this bill, this provision alone would be sufficient to kill it. It is an extension of this debt to all time, for nothing can be clearer. I need not repeat that, if they are to pay a million and a half a year when the interest is $3,000,000, they never will pay the debt and never can.

Again, the Judiciary Committee bill provides for a sinking fund to be created out of the net earnings of the company. The Railroad

Again, the Judiciary Committee bill provides for a sinking fund to Committee bill, which contains that definition and which I stomit is a perfectly correct one, is superior to a bill that omits the definition. In the second place, section 2 of the Judiciary Committee bill applies one-half the transportation account, as it is now applied—that is as it is earned—to the liquidation of the interest paid by the United States and the other half goes to the sinking fund. Now I beg the attention of my friend. Section 1 of the Railroad Committee bill. Let us see how that is. The half transportation account for 1875—and I will take that as an average—was $533,542.62 of the companies embraced in the Judiciary Committee bill. The 5 per cent of the net earnings for the same year was $772,137, making $1,305,679.87. That is the amount in 1875. If at a time of such depression as that the half transportation account and the 5 per cent. of net earnings which, under the existing law, these companies are bound to pay to the Government amounted to over $1,305,000, what may we expect to be the product of those sums when business is revived, as we trust it will in a very few years? It is perfectly clear to my mind that in a very short time the half transportation account and the 5 per cent. of the net earnings would amount to two million and a half dollars at the very least. That is what I believe will come with the revival of business; but what does this Railroad Committee bill propose? That they shall pay one million and a half. If you let the law stand precisely as it is, it will be worth perhaps a million dollars more to the Government every year than the bill which they propose to pass, without extending the time of payment at all, as they do to all eternity. Here is this proviso to section 3 in the Railroad Committee bill that struck me as astonishing: the half transportation account and the 5 per cent. of net earnbill that struck me as astonishing:

bill that struck me as astonishing:

Provided, however, That until the claims of the Government for said bonds and interest are fully paid, said companies shall not in any manner be released from their present liabilities to keep the said railroads and telegraph lines, constructed under the acts of Congress aforesaid, in repair and use, and to transmit dispatches over said telegraph lines, and transport mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroads for the Government, whenever required to do so by any department thereof, at fair and reasonable rates for compensation, (said rates not to exceed the amounts paid by private parties for the same kind of service,) the whole amount of which shall, upon the compliance by the companies with the provisions hereof, be paid by the Government to said companies on the adjustment of the accounts therefor; and that the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of said railroads and telegraph lines for all the purposes aforesaid: And provided also, That all Government freight and transportation west bound, destined for points between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast, and on the Pacific coast, and from said coast or any point east thereof, east bound, shall be sent by the said railroads until the aforesaid claims of the Government on account of bonds advanced to the companies are fully paid and satisfied, whenever such freight can be so transported to its place of destination at rates not exceeding the cost at which such freight can be carried by any other means of transportation.

This proviso is pregnant with this negative, that whenever the Gov-

This proviso is pregnant with this negative, that whenever the Government shall be re-imbursed the sum which it pays to these companies then they shall be no longer bound to maintain their roads at all. The great object of the Government in making such immense and. The great object of the Government in making such immense subsidies was to have the roads constructed and that they should be maintained, not for thirty years, the time these bonds had to run, but just as long as there should be a necessity for a railroad in the land. Now, this bill proposes to discharge them from all their obligations to maintain their roads immediately upon the repayment to

One word more, Mr. President, and I will give way, although there are several other points that ought to be considered. I was not aware that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] had given notice that he would ask the Senate to proceed to the election of commissioners at would ask the Senate to proceed to the election of commissioners at a given hour, and I do not want to interfere with that business at all. I have but one word to say further. The Senator from Oregon says the Government has no security now for its debts, and he thinks the bill of the Railroad Committee is much better on that account. I did not want to interrupt him; but I pray that he will tell us sometime during this debate where there is the least security in the world provided in the Railroad Committee bill that any one of its provisions provided in the Railroad Committee bill that any one of its provisions ever will be enforced.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator just now that there is no release of any present security.

Mr. THURMAN. I want the Senator to point out to the Senate where there is one particle of security given to the Government that one dollar ever will be paid. I do not say that it may not be done; but it has entirely escaped my observation. There are some other things that I could say on this bill, but I do not wish to delay the execution of the order which the Senator from Iowa desires. Possibly I may speak about it hereafter, although I do not know. I have done my duty in respect to this bill, I believe. It is a measure that requires important attention, and its importance can scarcely be magnified. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will act upon it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. George M Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1860) to incorporate the Washington City and Atlantic Coast Railroad Company;

A bill (H. R. No. 4473) for the relief of the destitute poor of the District of Columbia.

A bill (H. R. No. 443) for the reflect of the destitute poor of the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 4540) to provide for the payment of James B. Eads for the construction of jetties and other auxiliary works to make a wide and deep channel between the South Pass of the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico under contract with the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 4554) for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4556) to remove the political disabilities of Reuben Davis, of Mississippi.

to proceed to the consideration of the resolution that I submitted this morning, which is on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the pending order be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of considering the resolution in regard to the election of commissioners.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate now proceed, in accordance with the act entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, 1877, to appoint by viva voce vote five Senators to be members of the commission in said act provided for.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN. In voting for the five Senators who are to compose this commission so far as the Senate is concerned, I move that each Senator be called and rise in his place and vote for the five names at one and the same time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the election take place in the manner which he has stated, that as the respective names of Senators are called each Senator shall rise in his place and name the five Senators of his choice to compose a part of the commission.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, whatever observes the law and is the least cumbrous and inconvenient is the best way of observing it, I think. Can it be that this statute is not executed if some Senator will offer a resolution naming the five Senators and the will is called

I think. Can it be that this statute is not executed if some Senator will offer a resolution naming the five Senators and the roll is called and the members of the Senate vote "yea" to that resolution? If so, I submit that it is hardly worth while to name every Senator and have him rise and repeat over for himself separately, so that we shall hear seventy-five times the contents of such a resolution. Therefore if some Senator, if the Senator who proposed this resolution will allow, will offer an order or a resolution, something on which we can vote, naming the five Senators and let the roll be called and every man viva voce vote in that way, it will save a great deal of time and a great deal of trouble. Otherwise, as I say, we are to hear repeated seventy-five times over, if there are seventy-five Senators here, the contents and substance of such a resolution, which can be read once for all and voted for upon the call of the roll.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say that several plans of making this selection have been suggested among Senators, and that the question was raised as to whether under the provision of the law it would be competent to do so in the manner suggested by the Senator from New bers of the commission.

Mr. CONKLING. Would not that be viva voce?

Mr. WRIGHT. After consultation with several Senators, I concluded that it would be more acceptable than any other way that the names of Senators should be called and each Senator respond.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

Does he doubt as a lawyer that our commissioners will be elected viva voce if the names of five Senators are proposed, the roll is called, and every Senator in response votes for the five Senators so named? Is not that a viva voce vote? not that a viva voce vote ?

every Senator in response votes for the five Senators so named?

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator from New York suppose a gentleman did not want to vote for the five named?

Mr. CONKLING. Well, that is wholly another question. Each Senator would be compelled to vote "yea" or "nay." If he voted "yea" he would vote for the five; if he voted "nay" he would refuse to vote for the five, and for each of them. That, however, my honorable friend will see is suggesting a wholly different reason. I was with the Senator from Iowa merely on the point of the legal competency of executing the law, and on that point I submit to the Senate and even to the lawyers of the Senate that there can be no doubt the law would be complied with by proposing viva voce five names and then having the viva voce vote of every Senator upon those five names without compelling every Senator to rise, and as I have once or twice said, repeat over these names and the substance of such a resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. I entertain very grave doubts whether it would be a compliance with the statute to thus elect this commission. I put to the Senator from New York this case: By law, provision is made for the method of electing United States Senators, that they shall be elected by a viva voce vote in the two houses of the State Legislature. Now, I do not think it would be a compliance with that law to introduce a resolution that Mr. A B be Senator and have the names called for or against that resolution. I think that the law as it stands now contemplates a viva voce vote upon the persons that we propose to select. There is another reason for it. You name five persons in the resolution. It may be that I would be in favor of some two or three of them and be opposed to others. I must either vote for the resolution as a whole or against it as a whole. I think, therefore, that the statute is best complied with by having the names of Senators called, and they respond for whom they vote.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to put a question? Sup-

ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask that the Senate give unanimous consent now Statute is best complied with by having the names of Senators called, and they respond for whom they vote.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to put a question? Suppose some Senator desired to vote for five names which are not presented in the resolution, then his vote would be "yea" or "nay" on the resolution and he would be precluded from voting at all for the persons who are selected. It demonstrates itself that we cannot do it that way.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think it would be a better way and a more certain compliance with the law to adopt the proposition presented by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the resolution of the Senator from New

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that the Senator stated it orally.

Mr. CRAGIN. I simply made the motion that in voting to appoint the five Senators to form a part of this commission, each Senator as his name was called should rise in his seat and vote separately at one and the same time for five members of the Senate, naming them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempors. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN. I rise for the purpose of nominating three Senators who will be voted for or against to compose this commission, and I suggest the names of George F. Edmunds, Oliver P. Morton, and FREDERICK T. FRELINGHUYSEN, expecting that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. Stevenson] will name two other Senators. I hope that the Senators whose names I have suggested and the two others who will be suggested by my friend from Kentucky will be unanimously

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I rise to add to the list named by the Senator from New Hampshire the two names of ALLEN G. THURMAN, of Ohio, and THOMAS F. BAYARD, of Delaware. I concur n the sentiment expressed by the Senator from New Hampshire, and I hope these five gentlemen will receive the unanimous vote of the and announce his choice.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand these names have been selected by the caucuses of their respective parties, and as such I shall cheerfully vote for them, thinking that each party has the right to name the men to represent it. The three named by the republican and the two by the democratic caucus constitute our five of the commission; and with that understanding I shall cheerfully vote for all of them. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

ADDITIONAL TEMPORARY POLICE.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I submitted this morning a resolution directing the Committee on Rules of Order to inquire into the tion directing the Committee on Rules of Order to inquire into the expediency of making further provision by rule in relation to the admission of persons to the Capitol and requesting the committee to confer with the House Committee on Rules. The Senate committee have met the House committee and I have been directed by said committees unanimously to report for consideration a concurrent resolution, and if the resolution shall meet the approbation of the Senate I think it may pass now. I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives respectively be, and they are hereby, authorized each to appoint fifty men to serve as a special police at the Capitol during the canvassing of the votes for President and Vice-President, or for such portion of said time as they shall be necessary, said special police to be paid equally from the contingent fund of the Senate and of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is but a partial report of the committee. If it be wise to appoint the additional special police it should be done now that the two officers may have the time within which to make their selections. It is known I believe to all that the police force of this city is at the present time in a very bad condition—demoralized, a friend suggests. Indeed, I believe there is no police force here; and the object of this resolution is perhaps more to look to "the light-fingered gentry" who may be here and will be here on such an occasion than any other, although if needed for other purposes they will be here. The resolution met the united approval of both the House and Senate committees. and Senate committees and senate committees.

Mr. THURMAN. There is a great deal of curiosity, and will be a great deal of curiosity, to visit this Capitol, as there always has been when there is any matter of great interest to the public. With a general understanding that we have entered on an era of peace and goodwill, unless there is some serious reason for it, I do not see why there should be an additional police force, or any other force that deals either in muscle or in arms. I may be entirely wrong about it, but I suggest that the resolution had better lie over before we begin to put more nearly in uniform around the Capital.

gest that the resolution had better lie over before we begin to put more people in uniform around the Capitol.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have stated to the Senate what I will repeat, though the Senator from Ohio may have heard it. There is virtually no police force within this city on which any reliance can be had.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not hear that.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is utterly demoralized. This police force is for no other purpose, I think I may say, than to protect such citizens as shall come here from a class of desperate men who are pilfering always upon such occasions, and they are known to be here now—some of them, I am told—and others are on their way. That is the object of the police force, and it is called for from the necessity arising from the fact that there is no police here of any account.

Mr. THURMAN. If I had heard that explanation, which I did not, I should not have said one word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

The bill (H. R. No. 1860) to incorporate the Washington City and Atlantic Coast Railroad Company was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (H. R. No. 4556) to remove the political disabilities of Reuben Davis, of Mississippi, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DESTITUTE POOR OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (H. R. No. 4473) for the relief of the destitute poor of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title.

Mr. SPENCER. I hope the Senate will act on that bill now.
Mr. WINDOM. I rose to appeal to the Senate for the same purpose.
Mr. DAVIS. Does the bill come from a committee?

Mr. WINDOM. I rose to appeal to the Senate for the same purpose.
Mr. DAVIS. Does the bill come from a committee ?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the House of Representatives.
Mr. DAVIS. Is there any impending necessity?
Mr. SPENCER. Let the bill be read for information, and then we can explain it to the Senate.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.
The Chief Clerk read the bill. It appropriates $20,000 for the relief of the destitute poor in the District of Columbia to be drawn by warrants of the commissioners of the District on the Treasurer of the United States in such weekly installments as shall be presessed to United States in such weekly installments as shall be necessary to relieve the distress of those in absolute want. For the purpose of ascertaining the amount that is necessary to be drawn for each weekly installment, the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall require the relief commissioners of the District to furnish them the list of such families and the number of persons in each who are eligible of such families and the number of persons in each who are eligible and require relief from this fund.

Mr. DAVIS. I am inclined to think the bill had better go to a committee before it comes before the Senate for action. I do not know that I am opposed to it; I hardly think I am. My impression is now that I shall favor it; but there is no pressing necessity for its passing to-day, and even if there were bills ought to take their regular course and be considered by a committee before action by the Senate. So I object to its present consideration.

Mr. SPENCER. If there is any necessity for that bill ever passing the necessity is certainly pressing. I hope the bill will not be referred to a committee. I would say to the Senator from West Virginia that if it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia it will be reported back favorably, because a large majority of the committee are in favor of it. They have all been consulted. I hope the bill will be acted on now.

Mr. WINDOM. I rise to appeal to the Senator from West Virginia to withdraw his objection to the consideration of this bill now. If there is any necessity for it at any time, it is certainly very pressing now, and on information I have on the subject—and I have carefully read the debates elsewhere and the proofs that were presented—I think there is a very pressing necessity for it. I think it is no more than we ought to do, and that we ought to do it at once. There is great destitution; there is present suffering; and I am sure the Senator from West Virginia is the last man who would nost once relief the proof of the senator from West Virginia is the last man who would nost once relief the senator from West Virginia is the last man who would nost once relief the senator from West Virginia is the last man who would nost once relief the senator from West Virginia is the last man who would nost once the senator from West Virginia is the last man who would nost once the senator from West Virginia is the last man who would nost once the senator great destitution; there is present suffering; and I am sure the Senator from West Virginia is the last man who would postpone relief one day.

Mr. DAVIS. The bill itself as well as the Senator appeals to what would probably be charity or what would be my sense of right; but on principle I am opposed to bills coming from the House or elsewhere being immediately put on their passage. The bill now in question but for some one speaking would have passed without probably ten Senators here knowing exactly what it was. I would suggest to my amiable friend from Minnesota, than whom no man has greater influence over me, that he is chairman of the Appropriation Committee, and the Senator from Alabama is chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia and if they think proper to examine the the District of Columbia, and if they think proper to examine the bill and report it back to-morrow morning, it will be strictly in order, and I should much prefer that it should take that course. Let it go to a committee

Mr. WINDOM. I think there is no objection really in the Senate except the objection on principle that the Senator urges to passing it to-day; but I am sure when people are starving and freezing we can make an exception to that principle.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from West Virginia is mistaken. The reading of the bill was called for and the bill would have been read so that everybody in the Senate would have understood it. I can say that the Committee on the District of Columbia have acted on the bill informally this afternoon, and a majority of the committee have consented to its passage. tee have consented to its passage.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator says his committee has acted upon the bill, if he makes that statement to the Senate, he withdraws the objection that I urged against it.

Mr. SPENCER. A majority of the Committee on the District of Am. SPENCER. A majority of the Committee on the District of Columbia have agreed to report the bill this evening—five out of the seven members of the committee.

Mr. MORTON. I am told that there is great present suffering and that speedy action on this bill is demanded by every dictate of humanity. I hope it will be acted upon now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKPELL Lies to enter my chiestien on 2 the will be acted.

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to enter my objection, and it will be use less to appeal to me, because I cannot withdraw the objection. I move that the bill be referred to the committee.

Mr. SPENCER. Does one objection send it to a committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does, the bill having been received to-day. It will be referred to the Committee on Appropria-

COMMISSION TO TEST IRON AND STEEL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I desire to call the attention of Congress to the importance of providing for the continuance of the board for testing iron, steel, and other metals, which by the sundry civil appropriation act of last year, was ordered to be discontinued at the end of the present fiscal year. This board, consisting of engineers and other scientific experts from the Army, the Navy, and from civil life, (all of whom, except the secretary, give their time and labors to this object without compensation.) was organized by authority of Congress in the spring of 1875, and immediately drafted a comprehensive plan for its investigations, and contracted for a testing machine of four hundred tons capacity, which would enable it to properly conduct the experiments. Meanwhile the subcommittees of the board have devoted their time to such experiments as could be made with the smaller testing machines already available. This large machine is just now completed and ready for erection at the Watertown arsenal, and the real labors of the board are therefore just about to be commenced. If the board is to be discontinued at the end of the present fiscal year, the money already appropriated and the services of the gentlemen who have given so much time to the subject will be unproductive of any results.

The importance of these experiments can hardly be overestimated when we consider the almost endless variety of purposes for which iron and steel are employed in this country, and the many thousands of lives which daily depend on the soundness of iron structures. I need hardly refer to the recent disaster at the Ashtabula bridge in Ohio, and the conflicting theories of experts as to the cause of it, as an instance of what might have been averted by a more thorough knowledge of the property be conducted by private firms, not only on account of the expense, but because the results must rest upon the authority of disinterested persons. They must, therefore, be undertaken under the sanction of the Government. Compared with their great value to the industrial interests of the country, the expense is very slight.

The board recommend an appropriation of $40,000 for the next fiscal year, and I very slight.

The board recommend an appropriation of $40,000 for the next fiscal year, and I earnestly commend their request to the favorable consideration of Congress. I also recommend that the board be required to conduct their investigations under the direction of the Secretary of War and to make full report of their progress to that officer in time to be incorporated in his annual report.

No. 984) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railamend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, is before the Senate as in Committee of the

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill now pending, which I wish to have printed by to-morrow. The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

That there shall be paid to the credit of the said sinking fund by the Central Pacific Railroad company 25 per cent. of the whole net earnings of said railroad company, ascertained and defined as hereinbefore provided for, for the year ending 31st day of December next preceding; but the amount in any one year shall not exceed the sum of $1,500,000; and the amount thus paid into the sinking fund shall be in lieu of the 5 per cent. net earnings and one-half of the compensation for services as hereinbefore defined.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move the amendment be printed for informa-

The motion was agreed to.

Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 30, 1877.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

JAMES B. EADS.

Mr. JENKS. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4540) to provide for the payment of James B. Eads for the construction of jetties, and other auxiliary works, to make wide and deep the channel between the South Pass of the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico, under contract with the United States. The pending question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. And I move to lay that motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair yesterday decided that the motion to reconsider made by the gentleman from Michigan Mr. [CONGER] was not debatable. He adheres to that decision and now desires to give the House the reasons therefor by reference to the rulings as found

Where a vote taken under the operation of the previous question is reconsidered, the question is then divested of the previous question and is open to debate and amendment.

A mere motion to reconsider is not debatable, but if it is carried the subject is then divested of the previous question and is fully open to debate.

A motion to reconsider is not debatable if the question proposed to be reconsidered is not debatable.

It is in order, pending a demand for the previous question on the passage of a bill, to move a reconsideration of the vote on its engrossment; but such motion is not debatable under the practice which has prevailed for many years.

These rulings will be found in the Manual, pages 196-198.

These rulings will be found in the Manual, pages 190-195.

The Chair is therefore compelled to recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] to move to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair has given such attention to this question—he has examined it so closely, that while I think perhaps it is the correct decision, yet it is different from my supposition of what the practice was under the rules. It was my desire the motion to reconsider should prevail for the purpose of offering an amendment which I sak by unanimous consent may be read.

which I ask by unanimous consent may be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot consent to any amendment being introduced at this time, and therefore must insist on my motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. I only desire to have the amendment read for information, so the House may know why it is I make the motion to re-

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed so as to prevent any future payment to be made in bonds, if an appropriation therefor in money has not been made by Congress prior to the determination by the Secretary of War of the rights of said Eads and his associate to such payments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that will not be done.

Mr. CONGER. I insist on my motion to reconsider, and hope it will prevail so I may have an opportunity to move this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The necessary appropriation will be made for the future.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 84, noes 34.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table. Mr. HOLMAN. I now demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was assed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

NAVAL POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. By order of the House, this day has been set apart for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4389) to authorize the formation of a mixed commission to inquire and report as to the future naval policy of the Government of the United States, reported from the Naval Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that no motion is necessary in reference to that bill. The Chair supposes the gentleman rises to ask that it be considered now?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Yes, sir.
The SPEAKER. So far as the record shows, that bill has been set apart for consideration for to-day, and every day thereafter until disposed of; and it will therefore come up in order, and if not reached to-day will still hold its place in due course.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I only wish to have that understood.

ISAAC J. M'KINLEY.

Mr. WAITE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4555) for the relief of Isaac J. MacKinley, late a third lieutenant in the United States Revenue Marine Service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REUBEN DAVIS.

Mr. SINGLETON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4556) to remove the political disabilities of Reuben Davis, of Mississippi; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask that the bill may now be put upon its passage. It passed both Houses last year.

Mr. HALE. Is there a petition accompanying the bill?

The SPEAKER. There is.

The bill was read. It removes from Reuben Davis, a citizen of Mississippi, all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States by reason of participation in the rebellion.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

ALLEGED TAMPERING WITH MAILS.

Mr. COX. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the select committee charged with the investigation of alleged tampering with the mails in the New York post-office was recommitted. I ask to have the last clause of the report read, and move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. tion of the subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does this come up by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.
The Clerk read the last paragraph of the report, as follows:

The committee, therefore, after the most rigid examination, can find nothing to fix the slightest reproach on his (Mr. James's) conduct or that of his subordinates, and in conclusion they report that, in so far as the New York post-office is concerned, any suspicion of tampering with the mails is utterly baseless.

Mr. COX. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE F. WILSON.

Mr. GLOVER, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution for the relief of George F. Wilson, a former employé of the House; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts.

REPORT OF DISTRICT BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the following concurrent resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That 1,000 extra copies of the report of the board of health for the year 1876 be printed for use and distribution by said board.

HARBOR OF REFUGE ON OHIO RIVER.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for present consideration:

Resolved. That the Secretary of War be requested to report upon the expediency and utility of constructing a harbor of refuge upon the Ohio River, in what is known as Mill Bottom, above the city of Newport, on the Kentucky shore, and opposite to the city of Cincinnati.

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest to the gentleman that he modify his resolution by inserting after the words "harbor of refuge" the words "from ice-floods."

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I have no objection to that. That is the object of the resolution.

The resolution as modified was adopted

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON DISTRICT POLICE BOARD.

Mr. LE MOYNE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution for present consideration:

Resolved, That the testimony taken by the select committee of the House investigating the affairs of the board of police of the District of Columbia be printed and recommitted, and that said committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. PAGE. I object. Mr. WHITE. I demand the regular order.

VETO MESSAGE-DISTRICT POLICE BOARD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to lay before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith House bill No. 4350, to abolish the board of commissioners of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia and to transfer its duties to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, without my approval.

It is my judgment that the police commissioners, while appointed by the Executive, should report to and receive instructions from the District commissioners. Under other circumstances than those existing at present I would have no objection to the entire abolition of the board and seeing the duties devolved directly upon the District commissioners. The latter should, in my opinion, have supervision and control over the acts of the police commissioners under any circumstances. But, as recent events have shown that gross violations of law have existed in this District for years directly under the eyes of the police, it is highly desirable that the board of police commissioners should be continued, in some form, until the evil complained of is eradicated and until the police force is put on a footing to prevent, if possible, a recurrence of the evil. The board of police commissioners have recently been charged with the direct object of accomplishing this end.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 23, 1877.

Mr. BUCKNER. Ido not rise for the purpose of discussing the veto message. But for the circumstances surrounding us it might be very appropriate for this House to give some expression to its opinions and views upon the propriety of the Executive thus interfering directly with the legislative power of Congress. There is no pretense that there is any violation of the Constitution or any attempt to trench upon the prerogatives of the Executive. This is simply an act of legislation unanimously passed by both Houses of Congress which the President refuses to sign legislation unanimously passed by both Houses of Congress which the President refuses to sign I may say, sir, that before that bill was introduced by myself in this House I had assurances from one of the commissioners that the President approved of the bill; and it was asked that we should pass the bill because the President desired it or that he would not interfere with its passage. And therefore it seems to me very extraordinary that the President should send in his veto merely for the purpose of retaining these commissioners in power at this peculiar juncture. But, as I said, sir, I do not wish to discuss the question, and I therefore move that the bill be reconsidered, and upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. Allow me to make a suggestion on a point of parliamentary law. That is not the mode in which the question is put.

The SPEAKER. The question is put in this form: Will the House, mentary law. That is not the mode in which the question is put.

The SPEAKER. The question is put in this form: Will the House, on reconsideration, agree to pass the bill?

Mr. KASSON. The question comes right before the House, and I beg the gentleman from Missouri to allow me to say a single word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question as it now stands before the House before the vote is taken.

Mr. KASSON. I beg the gentleman from Missouri to allow me a single word as to the action which has been suggested by the President and considered prior to that suggestion by some members on this side of the House. Some censure was implied on the President in the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, which seems to me to imply a forgetfulness on his part that the President is a part of the law-making power of this Government and any statement of his opinion in advance is unauthorized by any of the facts which have been before the House. But certainly he has the same right in making laws as we have. In this particular case I sustained the bill as it passed the two Houses of Congress. I was of the opinion until I learned from citizens of this District that this action was right, and my opinion and that of others I know upon this side of the House is that this board should not be continued permanently, but that they should be enabled to complete the work upon which they have been engaged for a month or two. I think we may very wisely leave the continuation of this investigation to the present board instead of committing it to the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia. If the gentleman would introduce a bill providing for the abolition of this board after the 4th of March next it would be passed without objection by the House and with the same unanimity with which this bill was passed. At present, in view of the condition of without objection by the House and with the same unanimity with which this bill was passed. At present, in view of the condition of affairs as represented to us, we do not think that the bill should be passed pending the investigation of the action of these police commissioners. If the gentleman does this I presume the bill will pass with the same unanimity as it did formerly. I venture to make this suggestion, that he may consider it. suggestion, that he may consider it.

Mr. BUCKNER. Cannot the commissioners of the District of Co-

Mr. BUCKNER. Cannot the commissioners of the District of Columbia carry on the investigation themselves?

Mr. KASSON. I have reason to suppose that the commissioners of the District of Columbia could not pick up the investigation where it is now left by the present board, not being familiar with the facts, and moreover it would interfere with their duties.

Mr. BUCKNER. The board of commissioners of the District of Columbia have had no part in this investigation.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BUCKNER. I suppose the yeas and nays are required to be taken upon this question?

The SPEAKER. Certainly, under the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. Certainly, under the Constitution.

The question is, Will the House on reconsideration pass the bill, the objection of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 158, nays 79, not voting 53; as follows:

During the roll-call,
Mr. PLAISTED said: My colleague, Mr. FRYE, is absent from the House on account of sickness; if present he would vote "no."

After the roll-call,
Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.
Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object. This is an important vote, and I think it ought to be verified.

The roll-call was then read and the result announced as above recorded.

VETO MESSAGE-RESOLUTIONS RELATING TO CONGRATULATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return to the House of Representatives, in which they originated, two joint resolutions, the one entitled "Joint resolution relating to congratulations from the Argentine Republic," the other entitled "Joint resolution in reference to congratulations from the republic of Pretoria, South Africa."

The former of these resolutions purports to direct the Secretary of State to acknowledge a dispatch of congratulation from the Argentine Republic and the high appreciation of Congress of the compliment thus conveyed, the other directs the Secretary of State to communicate to the republic of Pretoria the high appreciation of Congress of the complimentary terms in which said republic has referred to the first centennial of our National Independence.

Sympathizing as I do in the spirit of courtesy and friendly recognition which has prompted the passage of these resolutions, I cannot escape the conviction that their adoption has inadvertently involved the exercise of a power which infringes upon the constitutional rights of the Executive.

The usage of governments generally confines their correspondence and interchange of opinion and of sentiments of congratulation as well as of discussion to one certain established agency. To allow correspondence or interchange between states to be conducted by or with more than one such agency would necessarily lead to confusion, and possibly to contradictory presentation of views and to international complications.

The Constitution of the United States, following the established usage of nations, has indicated the President as the agent to represent the national sovereignty in its intercourse with foreign powers, and to receive all official communications from them. It gives him the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties and to appoint embassadors and other public ministers, it intrusts to mix solely "to receive embassadors and other public ministers," thus vesting in him the ori wicked designs.

If Congress can direct the correspondence of the Secretary of State with foreign governments, a case very different from that now under consideration might arise, when that officer might be directed to present to the same foreign government entirely different and antagonistic views or statements.

By the act of Congress establishing what is now the Department of State, then known as the Department of Foreign Affairs, the Secretary is to "perform and execute such duties as shall from time to time be enjoined or intrusted to him by the President of the United States, agreeable to the Constitution, relative to correspondence, commissions, or instructions to or with public ministers or consuls from the United States, or to negotiations with public ministers from foreign states or princes, or to memorials or other applications from foreign public ministers or other foreigners, or to such other matters respecting foreign affairs as the President of the United States shall assign to said Department; and furthermore, that the said principal officer (the Secretary of State) shall conduct the business of the said Department in such manner as the President of the United States shall from time to time order or instruct."

partment in such manner as the President of the United States shall from time to time order or instruct."

This law, which remains substantially unchanged, confirms the view that the whole correspondence of the Government with and from foreign states is intrusted to the President; that the Secretary of State conducts such correspondence exclusively under the orders and instructions of the President; and that no communication or correspondence from foreigners or from a foreign state can properly be addressed to any branch or Department of the Government except that to which such correspondence has been com mitted by the Constitution and the laws.

I therefore feel it my duty to return the joint resolutions without my approval to the House of Representatives, in which they originated.

In addition to the reasons already stated for withholding my constitutional approval from these resolutions is the fact that no information is furnished as to the terms or purport of the communications to which acknowledgments are desired, no copy of the communications accompanies the resolutions, nor is the name even of the officer or of the body to whom an acknowledgment could be addressed given; it is not known whether these congratulatory addresses proceed from the head of the state or from legislative bodies; and as regards the resolution relating to the republic of Pretoria, I cannot learn that any state or government of that name exists.

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1877.

Mr. SWANN. I move that the message just read be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed. The motion was agreed to.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith the proceedings of the commission appointed to examine "the whole subject of reform and reorganization of the Army of the United States," under the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 24, 1876.

The commission report that so fully has their time been occupied by other important duties that they are not at this time prepared to submit a plan or make proper recommendations.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 29, 1877.

Mr. BANNING. I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the message was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TROOPS IN TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives :

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th of December last, inquiring whether any increase in the cavalry force of the Army on the Mexican frontier of Texas has been made as authorized by the act of July 24, 1876, and whether any troops have been removed from the frontier of Texas and from the post of Fort Sill on the Kiowa and Comanche reservation, and whether, if so, their places have been supplied by other forces, I have the honor to transmit a report received from the Secretary of War.

Mr. BANNING. I move that this message be referred to the Com-

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the message would more properly go to the Select Committee on the Texas Frontier Troubles.

Mr. MILLS. I think it has nothing to do with that subject; it refers to the northern frontier of Texas, and would properly go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion of Mr. Banning was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the message was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN OUTRAGES ON AMERICAN CITIZENS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith reports and accompanying papers received from the Secretaries of State and War, in answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th instant relative to the imprisonment and detention by the Mexican authorities at Matamoras of John Jay Smith, an American citizen, and also to the wounding and robbing by Mexican soldiers at New Lavedo of Dr. Samuel Huggins, an American citizen.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the documents were referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE rose.

COMPILATION RELATIVE TO COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] yields to me a moment that I may call up for action by the House the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 181) authorizing the Public Printer to bind in cloth the reserve and stitched copies of the House compilation entitled Counting the Electoral Vote. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution, with the Senate amendments, be now taken from the Speaker's table for consideration.

There was no objection, and the amendments of the Senate were read as follows:

In line 3 of the resolution strike out the words "and reserve." Amend the title by striking out the words "reserve and."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMISSIONERS ON COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. PAYNE. In pursuance of the notice given yesterday, I offer the following:

Resolved, That the House do now proceed by viva voce vote to appoint five members of the commission provided for in the act approved January 29, 1877, entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAMAR. I nominate as the five members of this commission on the part of the House of Representatives the following: Hon, Henry B. Payne of Ohio, Hon. Eppa Hunton of Virginia, Hon. Josiah G. Abbott of Massachusetts, Hon. James A. Garfield of Ohio, and Hon. George F. Hoar of Massachusetts. In order to save time

I move that the appointment of all these gentlemen be made viva voce by a single vote, so as to avoid the calling of the roll five times.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection that order will be

The SPEAKER. Announcing their names when his name is called.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask a parliamentary question, whether by common understanding, in order to save time, we may not vote for "the five nominees," instead of repeating all the names. There have been only five members nominated.

Mr. COCHRANE. I object.

Mr. DURHAM. I wish to propound an inquiry, whether or not we can vote for one, two, three, or four?

The SPEAKER. That is entirely within the province of each member. No member, however, can vote for more than five.

Mr. DURHAM. I understand that.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The SPEAKER announced that Mr. HOAR, Mr. PAYNE, Mr. HUN-TON, Mr. ABBOTT, and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed the commissioners on the part of the House.

APPOINTMENT OF TELLERS.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the Speaker be authorized to appoint tellers on the part of the House under the provisions of section 1 of the bill (S. No. 1153) in relation to counting the electoral vote.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Sniffen, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 2461) for the relief of certain officers of the Third

United States Artillery who suffered by fire at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, on the 3d of March, 1875; and A joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply blankets to the Reform School in the District of Columbia. The message also announced that the following bills were received by the President on the 17th of January, and not having been returned by him to the House within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become laws without his signature.

An act (H. R. No. 2300) granting a pension to Margaret C. Bell;

An act (H. R. No. 2835) for the relief of R. J. Henderson, of Newton County, Missouri.

INFRINGEMENTS OF PATENTS.

Mr. LYNDE. I rise to a privileged motion. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the bill (H. R. No. 3370) to amend the statutes in relation to damages for infringement of patents, and for other purposes, to be engrossed and read a third

Mr. SAMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I entered this motion to reconsider, and the understanding I have always had with the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. Lynder,] during at least half of the last session and also during the present session, was that when the motion was called up I should have the privilege of presenting an argument.

The SPEAKER. The practice is that any gentleman entering a motion to reconsider has the power to call it up at any time within two days of entering the motion. After that it is within the power of any member of the House to call it up; and if any gentleman should then raise the question of consideration, that is his privilege.

Mr. SAMPSON. I simply want to ask the gentleman from Wiscon sin [Mr. LYNDE] if he desires to call up the motion now.

Mr. LYNDE. I do.

Mr. SAMPSON. For the purpose of consideration, or with a view of moving to lay the motion to reconsider on the table?

Mr. LYNDE. I desire to move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. And for this reason: that this matter has remained so long without being brought before the House that it is too late now long without being brought before the House that it is too late now to have it fully considered.

Mr. SAMPSON. I desire to say just one word as to that. If the gentleman from Wisconsin had intimated a desire to call up the mofair understanding that I should be permitted to make a statement.

Mr. LYNDE. I have been very desirous to have this disposed of during the present session, and have waited I think to as late a period as there is any prospect of having that done.

Mr. SAMPSON. I now ask the gentleman that I may be permitted to say something in relation to this motion. It is a very important

Mr. LYNDE. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

Mr. CONGER. I raise the question of consideration at this time. I think this should be debated by the House, briefly at least, before it is disposed of in a summary way. It is a very important bill. The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now consider the motion to reconsider?

Mr. COV. Level.

Mr. COX. I understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr.

LYNDE] moves to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the gentleman from Michigan raises the question of consideration.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the question stated in the form in which it stood when last before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 3370) to amend the statutes in relation to damages for infringements of patents, and for other purposes, was ordered to be engrossed and read a ents, and for other purposes, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Conger] raises the question of consideration.

Mr. OLIVER. I desire to make the point of order that we have not had the morning hour yet. I demand the regular order.

Mr. COX. I suggest that it is too late to raise that point.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not understand that this takes precedence of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. This motion is privileged and may come up before or after the morning hour.

Mr. OLIVER. In the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Not in the morning hour; the Chair did not so state, but before or after, not during the morning hour.

Mr. OLIVER. It excludes the morning hour, then?

The SPEAKER. It delays it, not excludes it.

Mr. SAYLER. I raise the point of order that the point is raised too

The SPEAKER. It is too late anyway.

The vote was then taken on the question of consideration; and on

The vote was then taken on the question of consideration; and on a division there were—ayes 96, noes 45.

So the House decided to consider the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then will order tellers.

Mr. CONGER. I desire the yeas and nays upon this question.

The SPEAKER. It is the gentleman's right to call for them.

Mr. CONGER. I call for them because this bill is connected with patents and I wish to see how members will vote upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered. 29 members voting in favor thereof

The yeas and nays were ordered, 29 members will vote thou it.

Mr. KELLEY. If in order I would like to have the bill read, that we may understand what it is.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not been read to-day, and the Clerk will now read it.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, the plaintiff in any action at law or proceeding in equity, if found entitled in such proceeding or action to recover damages for infringement of any patent, shall recover only for such damages for infringement as shall have occurred for and during the term of one year immediately preceding the notice of infringement, and after such notice shall be given and until the date of the judgment: Provided, That where no other notice of infringement shall be given, the commencement of a suit for such infringement shall be construed as notice.

SEC. 2. That the measure of the plaintiff's damages shall be the same in law and in equity; and the rule in all cases shall be to give to the plaintiff, as far as possible, a reasonable recompense for his time, labor, ingenuity, and expense. Where a reasonable recompense for his time, labor, ingenuity, and expense. Where a reasonable recompense for his time, labor, ingenuity, and expense. Where a reasonable recompense to form of a license fee has been established, that shall be taken as the measure of damages; and where no such license fee has been established, the court or jury may determine, from the evidence, what would be a reasonable license fee, according to the circumstances of the case. And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the damages ought to be increased, the court may increase the same, not exceeding, however, three times the amount of the license fee, as shown, together with the costs. And the court shall have power, when necessary to prevent injustice, to diminish the damages in like manner. And no other recovery for damages or profits shall be allowed except as provided in this section.

SEC. 3. That every patent, or any interest therein, shall be assignable in law by an instrument in writing; and the patentee, or his assigns or legal representatives, may, in like manner, grant and convey an exclusive right under the patent for the whole or any specified part of the United States, or may grant licenses under said patent, exclusive or otherwise, as the parties may agree. And when there are two or more joint owners or owners in common, of any patent, a license from any one or said owners shall be good and valid in law, and shall vest in the licensee full right to the said invention, according to the terms of said license, unless the conveyance or other instrument creating gueb, joint ownership, or ownership in common, shall provide that no license shall be valid unless executed by all of such owners, or unless an agreement to that effect shall be made by said owners, and filed for record before the execution of said license.

SEC. 4. That all stuck grants, licenses, and conveyances, and all powers of attorney and agreements, made under any letters-patent, shall be acknowledged before an officer competent to take acknowledgments of deeds in the place where executed, and shall take effect from the time of filing the same for record in the Patent Office as to any subsequent purchaser, licensee, or mortgagee, for valuable consideration, without notice, and shall be void as to all such purchasers, licensees, and mortgagees, without notice, until filed for record as aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That any person who may wish to perpetuate testimony showing, or tending to show, that any applicant or patentee was not the first and original inventor of the thing patented by him, or of any substantial and material part thereof, claimed as new, may do so, subject to the following rules and conditions: He may file a bill or petition in the circuit court of any district in which the parties having the right to sue for infringement of said patent, or any of them, reside or may be found, setting forth the date and subject of the patent and the name of the patents. The patents of the patents having the

Mr. LYNDE. Mr. Speaker, I have moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the question of consideration, and the question now before the House is, Will the House consider the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] at this time, and on that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CONGER. Those who wish to consider the bill now will vote "aye," and those who wish to postpone it until we can discuss it will vote "no?"

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, and that is in the nature of debate.

Mr. CONGER. Very little debate.

So the House decided to proceed to the consideration of the subject, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Lynde to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. Lynde, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LYNDE. Upon that I call the previous question.
Mr. OLIVER. I desire to raise the question of consideration. I desire the regular order, which is the morning hour.
The SPEAKER. The House has just determined by a yea and nay vote that they would consider this subject at this time.
Mr. OLIVER. I understand that the House determined to proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider.

to the consideration of the motion to reconsider. The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would include the consid-

Mr. OLIVER. I supposed the motion to reconsider would have to be taken up and disposed of.

The SPEAKER. That has been laid upon the table, which brought the bill before the House.

Mr. EAMES. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is now in order, the previous question having been called.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the passage of the bill. Mr. CONGER. The bill, I think, has never been read the third

Mr. CONGER. The reading of this morning was not the third read-Mr. CONGER. The reading of this morning was not the third reading of the bill, but was only for information. I would ask for the record of the third reading, whether there has been a third reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The SPEAKER. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and the impression of the Chair is that the bill was read the third time, and then the motion to reconsider was made.

Mr. SAMPSON. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and then my colleague [Mr. OLIVER] called for the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill, and then the motion to reconsider was entered.

Mr. COX. The bill was ordered to be read the third time, but was not actually read the third time when so ordered. It was read again this morning for information, and the Chair might well consider whether that is the third reading.

The SPEAKER. It is usual to read a bill the third time by its title.

Mr. CONGER. The question was whether the House would con-

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the passage of the bill, upon which no quorum voted; and the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Lynde, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CONGER, to act as tellers.

Mr. CONGER. I made no objection to the lack of a quorum. I do not know why I should be called on to strand on a teller.

Mr. CONGER. I made no objection to the lack of a quorum. I do not know why I should be called on to stand as a teller.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAMPSON. I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD some remarks which I have prepared upon the subject of the bill just passed.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted.

The remarks of Mr. Sampson are as follows:

The remarks of Mr. Sampson are as follows:

The question to which I desire to ask the attention of the House for a few moments is the reconsideration of the vote by which House bill No. 3370, in relation to damages in actions for the infringement of patents, was ordered to be engressed. The bill proposes very radical changes in the rule of damages in this class of cases. The first section of the bill evidently is for the purpose of very materially reducing the damages, and it does not reserve from its operations actions pending nor causes of action already accrued. It reads:

SEC. 1. That from and after the passage of this act, the plaintiff in any action at law or proceeding in equity, if found entitled in such proceeding or action to recover damages for infringement of any patent, shall recover only for such damages for infringement as shall have occurred for and during the term of one year immediately preceding the notice of infringement, and after such notice shall be given and until the date of judgment: Provided, That where no other notice of infringement shall be given, the commencement of a suit for such infringement shall be construed as notice.

Now let us see what will be the effect of this:

Under the law as it now stands, and as it has stood since the inauguration of our patent system in 1790, where an infringement has extended over a period of several years, damages may be recovered for the whole time; the only limitation is, action must be brought within six years from the expiration of the term of the patent. Under this bill, as I have just read, damages will be limited to one year prior to service of notice. to service of notice.

Take a case like this for illustration: Say a party commenced the infringement of a patent eleven years ago, continued it for ten years, made a net profit by wrongfully appropriating another's property of $1,000 a year. That profit would be the measure of damages if the patentee had granted no licenses, and he would have a valid claim against the infringer of $10,000. Pass this bill and that ten-thousandagainst the infringer of $10,000. Pass this bill and that ten-thousand-dollar claim, the infringement having ceased one year ago, would not be worth a single cent. It would be legislated out of existence. But that claim for damages is property. It is created by act of Congress recognizing property in inventions. It is damages for the wrongful and unlawful use of the property of another—a right of action—and as much property within the meaning of the Constitution as money, goods, or lands, and is as much under the protection of the provision of the Constitution which says "no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law" as any other property. The best authorities say "the true interpretation of this constitutional provision is that where rights are acquired by the citizen under existing law there is no power in any branch of the Government to take them away."

It is usual in all enactments changing rights of action to save suits sending or causes of action already accrued, but for some cause this bill does not contain such a provision.

Another point to which I desire to call the attention of the House is this: It makes the right to recover depend mainly upon the fact of the owner's giving actual notice to the infringer that he is infring-ing. Now, should notice be required when the infringer may already ing. Now, should notice be required when the infringer may already have a guilty knowledge that he is infringing, or where the facilities and opportunities for knowing what is patented and what would constitute an infringement possessed by the public are far greater than the opportunities for the patentee to know what infringement may be going on against him and of when in fact he has not the knowledge?

I can conceive of cases where the infringing party may be entirely innocent; take a case where through want of knowledge or carelessness of examiners in the Patent Office two patents are granted by the Government for the same invention, and the second patentse, armed with his letters-patent, goes out into the country and puts his invention upon the market; parties buy and use the second patent in the utmost good faith, and perhaps years of litigation elapse, the question being a close one, before it is finally decided that the second patent was an infringement of the first.

patent was an infringement of the first.

Again, where there are many patented parts to one machine or structure, or improvement after improvement has been patented on the same thing, and there have been issues and re-issues, extensions, decrees, and judgments of courts declaring some valid and others invalid, I would protect the infringers against heavy damages on the principle that where two innocent parties must suffer on account of the uncertainty of rights and conflict of interests in this kind of property the final burden should not all rest on one. And in cases of this kind if the patentee did not speak out when he knew the infringer thought he had a right to use the property and warn him that it was his, his recovery should be very small.

his, his recovery should be very small.

But while there are cases of the kind I have mentioned and a very strict limitation of damages would be just in such cases, yet let us see if it is not probable that a majority of the cases of infringement are with a guilty knowledge on the part of the infringer. Great efforts are made under the law to keep the public generally informed

A record is kept of every patent; a model, if susceptible of one, is on exhibition; drawings and specifications may always be had for a trifling fee; the Official Patent-Office Gazette, showing all new pattrifling fee; the Official Patent-Office Gazette, showing all new patents issued, is placed on file in the capitol of every State and Territory and in the clerk's office of every district court of the United States, a sufficient number distributed gratis to enable almost every organized county in the United States where there is a public library to possess a copy, and any public library may procure a copy by paying simply cost of binding and transportation. Now with all these facilities to impart information of what is patented, we must conclude that a great many of the infringements are with a guilty knowledge of the wrong. And further, it is impossible in many instances, throughout such a vast extent of territory and amidst so many millions of people, for the patentee to have personal knowledge of the infringement, so as to be able to give the notice required by this bill. Again, it seems to me the rule sought to be established in the second section of this bill is not so definite, practicable, and just as the ond section of this bill is not so definite, practicable, and just as the one we now have. The rule of damages now is the actual loss which plaintiff sustains by the wrongful acts of defendant. The law gives plaintiff sustains by the wrongful acts of defendant. The law gives to the inventor the exclusive right, on his procuring a patent, to make, use, and sell his invention for the term of seventeen years. If he has not parted with any of this exclusive right by granting licenses to others, and the defendant has made and sold at a profit, after deducting all expenses, what was plaintiff's exclusive right to sell, then those profits he has derived from the use of plaintiff's property he must surrender to plaintiff. This is the rule of damages. If plaintiff has licensed any one to manufacture, then the defendant must pay a license fee the same as others and that license fee is the massure of license fee the same as others, and that license fee is the measure damages. This rule is comparatively simple and can be practically applied, and is based upon the sound doctrine that what a party has wrongfully taken away that he must restore. But the bill substitutes for this rule the following:

SEC. 2. That the measure of the plaintiff's damages shall be the same in law and in equity; and the rule in all cases shall be to give to the plaintiff, as far as possible, a reasonable recompense for his time, labor, ingenuity, and expense. Where a reasonable recompense in form of a license fee has been established, that shall be taken as the measure of damages; and where no such license fee has been established, the court or jury may determine, from the evidence, what would be a reasonable license fee, according to the curcumstances of the case.

Now this is not what we should attempt to give him in any one case, but what he should have received when the term of his patent expires. Counting all his profits from manufactures, sales of ma-chines, licenses, sale of territory, and all royalties of every descrip-tion, and to try to enforce this law literally would be to compel defendant, although he may not have damaged the plaintiff one dol-lar, to pay all the patent was worth or had cost. If it means that on lar, to pay all the patent was worth or had cost. If it means that on this principle the jury are to fix a license fee in all cases and take that as the damages, then it involves in each case, where license fee has not been fixed by plaintiff, the uncertain, speculative, interminable inquiry of how long did plaintiff labor to bring forth his invention; what should be allowed him for that; what was his expense; what degree of ingenuity did he display; what should be awarded him for that; what have been his profits and losses on the invention for the years that are past, and what will they probably be in the future with this or the other license? All this in place of the plain, simple sale. How many of the patented machines did defendant sell without right, and what were his net receipts thereon over and above all expenses? all expenses

Again, in determining what the license fee should be, if that is the object of the provision, the most important element of all, and that which must always govern the inventor himself when he fixes the fee, is omitted, and that is, what is the invention worth to the pub-But it will be seen that under this new rule the patentee is to be paid a reasonable recompense for his time, labor, ingenuity, and expense whether his patent is of any real value or not. A man may have spent half a lifetime, a liberal fortune, and displayed great ingenuity in getting up an invention, and a reasonable recompense for this might reach $10,000 or $50,000, and yet the invention itself may be entirely worthless, and the party who was foolish enough to infringe it may have lost money in the operation and his infringement been no damage whatever to plaintiff, and yet he would be liable for this large amount.

I am thoroughly impressed with the opinion, from these and other considerations, that the present rule of damages in this kind of cases is much more just, definite, certain, and equitable than the one proposed in this bill. I do not say the law may not be improved, but this is certainly not an improvement. I therefore hope the motion to reconsider will prevail, and the gentleman in charge of the bill will consent that it may be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order that it may be there again considered and modified to avoid these many objectionable features. fied to avoid these many objectionable features

Mr. EAMES asked leave to have printed in the RECORD some remarks on the bill as just passed.

Leave was granted.

The remarks of Mr. Eames are as follows:
Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to discuss the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Sampson] at any length, but I am desirous that it should prevail, so that the bill reported may be open to some amendment, without which the bill ought not to receive the approval of this

The bill relates to the subject of patents, and the Committee on Patents would seem to be the appropriate committee for the consideration of the provisions of the bill. It was referred, however, to the Committee on the Judiciary, and by that committee reported, and under the operation of the previous question was ordered to be en-grossed and was read a third time without any opportunity for amendment or debate.

The bill is one of great importance as effecting a radical change in the patent law, and as injuriously affecting the inventor, and the great amount of capital invested upon the faith of the exclusive right of an inventor for a limited time to his invention or discovery.

Under the Constitution Congress has power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and dis-

Under this provision of the Constitution Congress passed a law at Under this provision of the Constitution Congress passed a law at the second session of the First Congress entitled "An act to promote the useful arts," securing to the inventor the sole and exclusive right to his invention for a period not exceeding fourteen years, and provided the mode of securing this exclusive right in the courts of the United States by action at law, and subsequently by action at law and by bill in equity. These provisions, substantially as embraced in sections 4919 and 4921 of the Revised Statutes, have been in force since Luk 4 1826. This relief has resulted in the great in ventions. since July 4, 1836. This policy has resulted in the great inventions of the age, the cotton-gin, the steam-engine, the printing-press, the electric telegraph, and a very large number of inventions in machinery and agricultural implements.

A large amount of capital has been invested and a great number of employés engaged in the manufacture of articles protected under the existing law.

The benefit which the public under this policy has derived in every branch of industry can hardly be overestimated.

With but a few exceptions the inventor has been very inadequately compensated for the benefits which his invention has conferred upon the public. This remuneration has only been secured by the protection of the inventor under the provisions of the existing laws. Every invention requires time, labor, skill, expense, and capital. The essential requisite of capital cannot be secured unless the inventor is secured. cured in the exclusive use of his invention; and when so secured the result in all useful inventions has been a better article at a less price.

If this right to the exclusive use is taken from the inventor the incentive to improvement is at the same time taken away and would defeat the purpose of the provision of the Constitution, alike to the injury of all. But even this right to the exclusive use, which is the only incentive to invention and improvement, would be of no avail unless protected by the courts, and this bill will deprive the inventor of this protection. It provides in the first section that after the passage of the act the inventor shall recover only for such damages for infringement as shall have occurred for and during the term of one year immediately preceding notice of infringement, and after such notice shall be given and until the date of judgment.

This bill does not propose to change the period of seventeen years as the period within which an inventor shall have under the Constitution the exclusive right to use his invention, but limits the period to one year from notice of infringement for which he may recover to one year from notice of infringement for which he may recover any damages for the infringement. Under the law as it now exists the patent secures the exclusive use for seventeen years. Under this bill it is proposed to limit the right to recover for damages to a period of one year before, without any knowledge by the inventor of the infringement, notice has been given to the infringer. No such limitation has been applied in any other case of protection to rights of property. Indeed the bill does not even save the rights of inventors under existing law in suits now pending for the infringement of patents, nor does it allow any time within which suits may be brought to recover under the existing law for infringements upon patents to recover under the existing law for infringements upon patents committed before the passage of this bill; nor make any distinction between patents granted before and those granted after the passage of this act. Heretofore when any change has been made in the patent law Congress has been very careful to protect pending suits, and patents which had been issued as well as rights existing at the time any such change was made.

In all the changes which have been made in the law the provision, in substance, has been made that such change should not affect any act done, or any right accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil cause, or take away any right under

This bill makes no provision for infringements for which no suit has been commenced, nor does it prescribe any time within which such suit may be commenced. It makes no provision for pending suits, nor does it make any distinction between patents which have suits, nor does it make any distinction between patents which have heretofore been granted and such as may be granted after its passage. In these respects the bill is in conflict with rights vested by the Constitution, which secures the exclusive right to the inventor for a limited time. The provision of the Constitution in this respect is clear and explicit. It is the exclusive use for a limited time. Congress may decline to exercise the power, but if exercised it must be in the manner prescribed, and when exercised it vests in the inventor a right to the exclusive use for the time named, which has been recognized in every change which has been made in the law and which ought to be now provided for if this bill is to become a law. It should protect all rights under the existing law; leave pending suits to be determined as if the bill had not passed; and should apply only to patents which may hereafter be granted; and, in my judgment, even with these provisions ought not to receive the approval of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to askthe concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 1139) to change the time of holding the October term of the United States district court for the district of Nebraska;

DISPUTED ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. COX, by unanimons consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved. That the Judiciary Committee be directed to take into consideration the propriety of reporting a bill or an amendment to the Constitution, if necessary, providing for the decision of any questions which may arise as to the regularity and authenticity of the returns of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, or the right of persons who gave the votes, or the manner in which they ought to be counted, and that such law or amendment provide for the jurisdiction as well as the course of proceeding in all cases of real controversy.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TEXAS AND PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. LEVY, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the presidents of cotton exchange, chamber of commerce, banks, and insurance companies of New Orleans, praying for the passage of the bill granting aid to the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, and to make the New Orleans Pacific Railway a branch thereof; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be winted in the Paccopp. as follows: printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The New Orleans Cotton Exchange, and Chamber of Commerce, commercial bodies presenting large interest in Gulf States, respectfully pray your honorable bodies to adopt the New Orleans Pacific Railroad, now being constructed from Alexandria to Shreveport and Marshall, as the branch to connect the Texas and Pacific Railroad with the city of New Orleans, and to grant to it such aid as will insure its completion. The New Orleans Pacific is the only road in this State on which work is being prosecuted. The road is under the direction of prominent citizens of New Orleans who have the confidence of the people. The rapid construction of this road would give employment to many laborers now destitute, and contribute to restore to the people the blessings of prosperity.

JOHN A. DARLING.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4557) for the relief of John A. Darling; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Judiciary, for printing and recommitment a substitute for House bill No. 4075, to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864.

Mr. HURD. I object.

COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the House order the Clerk to notify the Senate of the action of the House in appointing members of the commission on counting the electoral votes. There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Gorham, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had proceeded to appoint by a viva voce vote five Senators to be members of the commission provided for in the act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, and had chosen Mr. EDMUNDS, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. MORTON, Mr. THURMAN, and Mr. BAYARD.

The message further announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolution in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives respectively be, and they are hereby, anthorized each to appoint fifty men to serve as a special police at the Capitol during the canvassing of the votes for President and Vice-President, or for such portion of said time as they shall deem necessary, said special police to be paid equally from the contingent fund of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. Knorr.]
Mr. HOLMAN. With the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky I wish to state that immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning, I will move that the House proceed to consider in Committee of the Whole the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman at any time for that motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been understood that the Colorado question was specially set for to-day and for that reason no motion has been made to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business before the House, which the Chair supposed the gentleman from Kentucky desired to move to postpone, is the report of the select committee on the powers and privileges of the House in counting the electoral votes.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM COLORADO.

Mr. KNOTT. I rose to a question of privilege—to call up the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary in regard to the Representative from Colorado.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of higher privilege, because it affects the right of a member to his seat on this floor.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. That is a question of higher privilege, because it affects the right of a member to his seat on this floor.

Mr. KNOTI. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Jadiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of James The Committee on the Jadiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of James as member of Congress from the State of Colorado, would respectfully report:

That the Congress of the United States, by an act entitled "An action challe the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal focing with the original States, included in certain boundaries therein designated, to form for themselves a State of government, with the name of the State of Colorado, and declared that such State when formed should be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respectes whatsoever, as therein the provided.

and the third section declares who shall be entitled to vote for and eligible as delegates to a convention to frame a constitution, provides for the apportionment of representatives, the time and manner and by whom the election should be ordered.

The fourth section provides for the time and designates the place at which the members elected to the convention should meet, and that after organization they should declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopted the Constitution of the United States, and that thereupon they should be anthorized the constitution should be republican in form, and make no distinction in elvil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed, and not repugnant to the Constitution should be republican in form, and make no distinction in elvil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and they principles of the Declaration of Independence: And provided further, That said convention his delegated authority to another, especially when it rests in confidence partaking of the nature of a trust, and requiring for its proper discharge integrity and understanding—a principle peculiarly applicable to the Government of the United States as one of purely delegated and carefully limited powers. They maintain that Colorado is a State in the Union by force and virtue of the will of Congress, as expressed in the act of March 3, 1875, or not at all.

It is provided in section 3 of article 4 of the Constitution, that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union," but no precise formula in which this power is to be exercised is anywhere prescribed, nor is there anything in the Constitution conferring, or authorizing Congress to confer, such authority upon any other department of the Government whatever, further than the provision in the seventh section of the second article, which requires the assent of the President to every order, resolution, or vote of either House which requires the concurrence of the other, or a vote of two-thirds of each House to give it validity in the event of his disapproval. It is manifest, therefore, that while Congress and Congress alone has the power to admit a State into the Union, it may do so in any manner consistent with the spiritof the Constitution it may deem proper, the one essential fact being that the compact between the United States, acting through its constitutional agency, on the one part, and the newly admitted State on the other, has been mutually agreed to, and is binding on each.

Such appears to have been the accepted theory from the organization of the Government, and an examination of the proceedings had upon the admission of the various States which have been admitted into the Union since the adoption of the Federal Constitution will show that there has been no uniform mode of procedure in such cases at all, while in some instances the method pursued was far more loose and careless than can be pretended in the one under consideration. Inde be admitted into the Union as a State. A bill to that effect at once passed both Houses, and was approved February 18, and on the 25th of the same month another law was approved allowing the newly admitted State two Representatives in Congress.

On the 8th of April, 1796, President Washington communicated to Congress that among the advantages and privileges secured to the inhabitants of the territory south of the Ohio by act of May 28, 1790, appeared to be the right of forming a permanent constitution and State government, and of admission as a State into the Union, and that he had received proofs of the several requisites to entitle the territory south of the Ohio to such admission, which, together with the constitution upon which they had agreed, be laid before Congress. This message was referred in the Senate to a committee, who reported against the immediate admission of the State so formed, on the ground that Congress must have previously enacted that the whole of the territory ceded by North Carolina should be laid out for one State before the inhabitants could claim to be admitted as a new State Into the Union, even admitting them to amount to 60,000 free persons. A bill was accordingly introduced and passed in the Senate on the 26th of May, 1796, providing for laying out the territory ceded by North Carolina to the United States as one State, and for an enumeration of the inhabitants thereof. The bill was amended in the House so as to read "that the whole of the territory ceded to the United States by North Carolina shall be one State, and the same is hereby declared to be one of the United States of America on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever." The Senate agreed to the amendment, and the act was approved June 1, 1796, and thus Tennesses was admitted into the Union without any antecedent enabling act, and upon a constitution adopted without any previous assent of Congress.

On the 7th of February, 1802, a petition was received in the House of Representatives, from the i government in the following terms: "That the inhabitants of the Territory of Indiana be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and to assume such name as they shall deem proper; and the said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon the same footing with the original States in all respects whatever;" which became a law by the approval of the President, April 19, 1816.

Under the authority thus conferred, the people of Indiana proceeded to frame their constitution and organize a State government. They elected their Representative and Senators in Congress, and appointed their electors in the presidential election, which took place in the fall of that year, who cast their votes and sent them up to the seat of Government. On the assembling of Congress, Mr. Hendricks, the Representative from Indiana, was admitted to his seat, and voted without question upon all subjects which came before that body. A committee was, however, appointed in the Senate on the 2d of December, 1816, to inquire whether any further proceedings were necessary to admit Indiana into the Union, who reported the following resolution, which passed the Senate on the 6th, the House on the 9th, and was approved by the President on the 11th of December, 1816.

"Resolved, That the State of Indiana shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever."

That Indiana was regarded by both Houses of Congress as a State in the Union before the adoption of this resolution, and that it was passed more as a matter of form, and out of an abundance of caution, than as being actually necessary to consummate her admission, is obvious, not only because her Representative was admitted to his seat at the opening of the session, and because her Senators, who had been elected before the assembling of Congress, were sworn in without question and House, after the validity of sai Ontion.

The State of Massachusetts having, by act of June 19, 1819, given its consent that the people of that portion of the State theretofore known as the District of Maine should form themselves into an independent State, the people of that district proceeded to erect a State government and frame a State constitution agreeably to the provisions of that act, and Congress, by act March 3, 1820, admitted the State of Maine into the Union upon an equal footing with the other States in all respects whatever.

Maine into the Union upon an equal footing with the other states in an expect whatever.

Next occurred the memorable case of Missouri. It is not deemed necessary to encumber this paper with a detailed recital or labored review of the proceedings which were had in Congress, either upon the proposition for an enabling act or the subsequent bill for the formal admission of the State into the Union, notwithstanding they constituted one of the most interesting episodes in the legislative history of the country; but suffice it to say the people of Missouri having, by authority of the act of March 20, 1820, framed a constitution, the same was referred to a select committee in the House of Representatives, from which Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina, on the 23d of November, 1820, reported a resolution in the form which had been adopted in several other instances "That the State of Missouri shall be, and is hereby, declared to be one of the United States in all respects whatever."

into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever."

Exception was, however, taken to a clause in the constitution which required the Legislature to pass laws prohibiting the immigration of free people of color into the State. This led to a resistance of the passage of the resolution, and opened up a discussion which finally ended in the adoption of the following proposition, sub mitted by Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, known as the second Missouri compromise, which was approved March 2, 1821: "Missouri shall be admitted into this Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution, submitted on the part of said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen shall be entitled under the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of said State shall, by solemn act, declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of the said act, upon receipt of which the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete." This condition was subsequently complied with, and the President's proclamation issued August 10, 1821; since which time the fact that Missouri was a State in the Union has never been questioned.

Since the admission of Missouri the practice, in a majority of instances, has been to declare the State admitted into the Union by a formal enactment, taking effect from the date of its place to call attention.

For instance, by act of June 15, 1836, entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of Michigan into the Union upon the terms therein expressed," the constitution which the people of Michigan had previously framed for themselves, was ratified, and it was provided that when the boundaries set forth in the act should receive the assent of a convention of delegates of said State she should be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the other States without any further action on the part of Congress. Two conventions were held: one elected in pursuance of an act of the Legislature, which, on the 26th of December, rejected the fundamental condition which had been prescribed by Congress, and the other, a convention of delegates elected from all counties except two, in pursuance of resolutions adopted by meetings of the people themselves in their primary capacity, which, on the 14th of December, 1836, assented to the condition.

in their primary capacity, which, on the 14th of December, tool, assessed to the condition.

President Jackson, who was required by the act to issue his proclamation recognizing Michigan as a State in the Union upon a compliance with the condition therein prescribed, said that had this condition of things arisen during the vacation of Congress he would have recognized the action of the convention originating with the people themselves, but as Congress was in session he deemed it proper to lay the matter before it for decision. The subject was accordingly referred to the Judiciary Committee in the Senate, which reported a bill which became a law, by the approval of the President, on the 26th of January, 1837, declaring "that the State of Michigan shall be and is hereby declared to be one of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever."

On the next day Mr. Crary, member of Congress elect from the State of Michigan, presented himself to be sworn in, when Mr. Robertson objected on the ground that Michigan was not a State when Mr. Crary was elected, but the House decided by a vote of 150 yeas to 32 nays that he should be qualified as a member of the House, which was accordingly done and he took his seat as such. On the same day, January, 27, 1837, the Senators from Michigan were sworn in and seated without objection.

on the next day Mr. Crary, member of Congress elect from the State of Michigan presented himself to be sworn in, when Mr. Robertson objected on the ground that Michigan was not a State when Mr. Crary was elected, but the House decided thouse, which was accordingly done and he took his seat as such. On the same day, January, 37, 1837, the Senators from Michigan were sworn in and seated without objection. The provision of Virginia known as West Virginia had, by a convention assembled at Wheeling, on the 39th of November, 1981, framed a constitution with a view of becoming a separate and independent State; that at an election held in various approved and alopted by the qualified voiers of said proposed State, on the 3d of May, 1992; that the Legislature of Virginia, on the 30th of May, 1992, gave its consent to the formation of a new State within the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia, some of the promation of a new State within the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia of the said State of West Virginia be, and is increby declared to be, one of the United States for America, and admitted into the United States of America, and admitted into the United States of America, and admitted into the Provided, alseage, That this act shall not take effect until after the proclamation of the President of the United States bereinafter provided for."

The second section of the act shall not take effect until after the proclamation of the President of the United States breeinafter provided for."

The second section of the act shall not take effect until the three provision in their constitution, and proceeds to declare that "when the people of New Stripting shall, through said convention, and by a vole to be taken at a election to be held within the limits of the said State, at such time as the convention of the United States to issue his proclamation stating the fact, and therepon this said shall the verification of the American and the provision of the Federal Union, have been copied literally, certainly substantially, in United States.) and that within a certain time after the happening of a particular event it shall be a member of the Union, as was the case with Missouri and some others.

It may not be improper to observe, in passing, that on the very day on which the act for the admission of Nevada into the Union was approved an act, in precisely similar terms, entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," was also approved; but that, not-withstanding that enactment, the people of the Territory continued to occupy their former relations to the United States, simply because they failed to avail themselves of the proffered privilege of becoming an independent political community—in other words a State—on the terms and in the manner proposed, and of thus rendering themselves competent as a body-politic to assent to the compact necessarily implied in the very terms "admitted into the Union," which of themselves import the concurrence of two separate and independent wills, one proposing to enter the Union and the other consenting thereto, or one proposing to the other to enter upon terms consistent with the Constitution, and the other accepting the proposition by a compliance with the terms prescribed.

It may be objected to this view, however, that Congress should first be satisfied as to whether the constitution of the new State is republican in form; whether the proper boundaries have been determined upon; whether the population is sufficient; whether the proper qualifications of the elective franchise have been fixed; whether the character of the population for virtue and intelligence is such as to make it desirable that they should be admitted into the Union upon an equality with the other States, &c., but it will be observed that these are all mere questions of policy; and while it would certainly be prudent in Congress to be fully satisfied upon all such points before admitting a pursuance thereof become the supreme law of the newly admitted State, anything in its constitution in was to the contrary nowithstanding. Consequently any provision in its constitution inconsistent with the Federal Constitution is abrogated and annulled by the very fact of its entering the Union on an equality with the other States.

In view of the firth already stated, that it would certainly be more prudent for Concrete other and the state of the contract of the contract of the state of the contract of the contract of the contract of the state of the contract of the admission of a new State a has been contract of the admission of a new State a has been contract of the admission of a new State a has been deep or the contract of the contrac

Assuming that the people of Colorado had in point of fact performed in good faith every condition prescribed in the act in strict conformity with its provisions, the present Congress would be bound in good morals to recognize them as a State and admit them to representation in the Senate and House, even if the President had willfully refused to issue the proclamation provided for, and the only possible pretext for a failure upon the part of Congress to discharge its solemn obligation in that regard would be found in the quibble that the people of Colorado had agreed that their admission should depend finally upon the issual of a proclamation willfully withheld without any fault upon their part, and after they had religiously observed and performed every obligation resting upon them.

Believing that they have discharged those obligations, and that every condition upon which Colorado was to be admitted into the Union has been complied with, your committee would respectfully recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of John R. McPherson, elected by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1877; which were read and ordered to be filed.

SENATOR SWORN IN.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] I present the credentials of Frank Hereford, elected by the Legislature of the State of West Virginia a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Allen T. Caperton. I ask that the credentials be read and the oath of office administered to Mr. Hereford.

The credentials were read; and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. HEREFORD, he took his seat in the Senate.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Acting Commissioner of Patents, transmitting the annual report of the operations and condition of the Patent Office for the year 1876 as required by section 494 of the Revised Statutes; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a communication from certain associate justices of the Supreme Court, which will be read by the Secretary.
The Secretary read as follows:

To the President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of the secand of the Cruca States:

"An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4. A. D. 1877," approved January 29, 1877, the undersigned associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States assigned to the first, third, eighth, and ninth circuits respectively, have this day selected Hon. Joseph P. Bradley, the associate justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the fifth circuit, to be a member of the commission constituted by said act.

Respectfully submitted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. George M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3370) to amend the statutes in relation to damages for infringement of patents, and for other purposes; in which it requested the oncurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that, the President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with his objections thereto in writing, the bill (H. R. No. 4350) to abolish the board of commissioners of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, and to transfer its duties to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, the House of Representa-tives proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the and had passed it by a two-thirds vote, notwithstanding the same.

The message further announced that the House had passed a resolution for the printing of 1,000 extra copies of the report of the board of health of the District of Columbia, for the year 1876, for use and distribution by said board.

The message also announced that the House had appointed Mr. HENRY B. PAYNE of Ohio, Mr. EPPA HUNTON of Virginia, Mr. Josiah G. Abbott of Massachusetts, Mr. George F. Hoar of Mr. Hoar of M chusetts, and Mr. JAMES A. GARFIELD of Ohio commissioners on the part of the House authorized by section 2 of the act of Congress enti-tled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, 1877.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 181) authorizing the Public Printer to bind in cloth the reserved and stitched copies of the House compilation entitled Counting the Electoral Vote.

ADMISSION TO THE CAPITOL DURING COUNT.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Committee on Rules, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire whether it be necessary to adopt any measures with reference to admissions to the Capitol during the counting of the electoral votes, have had the same under considera-tion. Yesterday that committee made a partial report. They have further considered the resolution in conjunction with the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives, and have instructed me to report the resolution agreed to by the committee of the House of Representatives and the committee on the part of the Senate, and to ask that it be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina, from the Committee on Rules, reports a resolution, which will be

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That during the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, no persons besides those who now have the privilege of the floor of the House of Representatives shall be admitted to that portion of the Capitol set apart for the use of the House and its officers except upon tickets to be issued by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, and that the tickets to be issued under this resolution shall be distributed under the direction of the Committees on Rules of the two Houses.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to amend the resolution by striking out, after the word "distributed," the words "under the direction of the Com-mittees on Rules of the two Houses" and insert "equally to each Senator and Representative by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives."

I only wish to say that by the resolution you may call upon the Committee on Rules on the part of the Senate to perform ministerial service, clerical service, or whatever you may choose to call it. I think it a more appropriate way, after the Houses issue these tickets, to put them in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms of each branch and let him deliver them to members instead of compelling the committee to do it. It disposes of the tickets precisely in the same way that they are now disposed of, only in another channel. I hope the Senate will excuse the committee from doing that service; if not, I shall regret it

Mr. MERRIMON. The committee came to the conclusion that only about a certain number could be accommodated in the gallery of the House.

Mr. INGALLS. How many?

Mr. MERRIMON. About twelve hundred. That would allow each member about three tickets, allowing a larger number to certain offimember about three tickets, allowing a larger number to certain officers whom it would be necessary should have some extra tickets, and it was thought better to have this matter under the direction of the two Committees on Rules. If it should be found that more persons could get into the galleries they might direct a larger number to be issued; if it should be found that they were too much crowded they would regulate that duly. A copy of this resolution was to be referred to the House of Representatives and I do not know whether they have sent their action to this body or not. Those are the considerations which move the committee to take this course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senate will note that I do not propose in any way or manner to change the final result arrived at; I only ask that it shall be done through another channel, that the Senate will not impose upon a committee of this body the ministerial duty of distributing these tickets, but let our Sergeant-at-Arms do that for the Senate instead of compelling the committee to do it.

Mr. MORRILL. As has always been done heretofore.
Mr. HAMLIN. Then say so. My friend from Vermont says that has always been the way; then let us say that it shall be the way

Mr. CLAYTON. Let the resolution be reported as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. - The resolution as amended will be

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as proposed to be amended, as

Resolved, That during the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, no persons besides those who now have the privilege of the floor of the House of Representatives shall be admitted to that portion of the Capitol set apart for the use of the House and its officers, except upon tickets to be issued by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, and that the tickets to be issued under this resolution shall be distributed equally to each Senator and Representative by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. MERRIMON. The resolution as reported was agreed to by a majority of the committees. It does not impose the duty upon the Committee on Rules of distributing these tickets. They are to be distributed under their direction, and the truth is that there will be very little embarrassment or trouble to anybody. The tickets will be prepared, the Senate's share of them, sent to the President of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and he will direct the Senate, Arms or some proper officer to distribute them through the Sergeant-at-Arms or some proper officer to distribute them through the mail so that there will be no trouble or embarrassment under it to anybody. It was thought wise to keep the matter under the direction of the Committee on Rules, because we may want to increase the number if we find there shall be room for additional persons or we may want to decrease the number if we find the galleries too much crowded.

Mr. HAMLIN. Before the Senator sits down I want to put a question to him, and before doing that I wish to state to the Senate that I was unavoidably absent from the meeting of this committee this I was unavoidably absent from the meeting of this committee this morning, being compelled to attend the meeting of another committee. I want to know from the Senator whether this includes the gallery? It does not say so.

Mr. MERRIMON. O, yes; this includes the gallery. It embraces all that portion of the Capitol that is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BLAINE. It does not say so.

Mr. MERRIMON. Let the resolution be read again.

The Chief Clark again read the resolution

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina what part of the Capitol is under the exclusive control of the House of Representatives, for I confess I do not know. This proposition seems to exclude persons not only from the floor of the House and from the gallery, but from every part of the Capitol that is under the exclusive control of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Chamber of the House of Representatives, and galleries, and the cloak-rooms, and the rooms adjoining that Chamber, and perhaps it might also be construed to embrace the committee-rooms under the direction of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Senator will allow me, I think the usual understanding has been that all south of the Rotunda is under the control of the House, and that all north of it is under the control of the Senate; I suppose the Rotunda is a sort of neutral ground where we both meet on equal terms.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am not prepared to vote for exactly that resolution. There will be a great many persons, doubtless, here from various parts of the country, many of whom have never yet seen the capital of their country. Under the operation of this resolution, during the session of the two Houses in joint convention, they could not see a portion of this Capitol when it would not be the least inconvenient to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives for them to do so.

Now I am in favor of a resolution which, if not so broad in its terms Now I am in favor of a resolution which, it not so broad in its terms as to enable the people to look down from the galleries upon the two Houses in Congress assembled, ought to give them the privilege of going to every other part of the Capitol outside, provided it is not inconvenient to the two Houses. In fact, this is a question which interests the whole country. We are to ascertain who is to be the Chief Executive of this country for the next four years, and it is a question in which the people of every portion of the country feel some interest. Let every man have a chance to go into the galleries. At least I am democratic enough to be in favor of letting every man go into the gallery who can get admission.

go into the gallery who can get admission.

Mr. MERRIMON. That matter was considered, and the committee upon consideration determined that it would be wise to exclude everybody from the Capitol during the counting of the electoral vote. Every American citizen will have the right to come into the Capitol as he has to-day; but it was deemed perfectly right and proper that Congress should regulate how persons should come into the presence of the two Houses sitting in joint assemblage for the purpose of counting the votes. It would not be wise to have disorder there or to put things in such condition as that disorder could prevail there. True it is that everybody has the right to know what is going on in Congress while this vote is being counted; but everybody cannot be there; everybody cannot exercise his right to look upon the count. It is therefore deemed wise to allow the representatives of the people to have each a certain number of tickets to use as he pleases, inviting such of his constituents as he sees proper into the galleries to see the vote counted, so that the whole American people, through their representatives, shall see what is done there and have the advantage of being present. Only a number can be present anyhow, and we could not devise any means that was more just than to allow the representabody from the Capitol during the counting of the electoral vote.

tives of the people to decide who of the people should be present. Three tickets will be issued to each member of the House and each Senator, and each will invite whom he pleases to be present.

Mr. SHERMAN. There does not seem to be any difference of opinion about what ought to be done, but that portion of the resolution which speaks of the part of the Capitol under the exclusive jurisdiction of the House of Representatives is not clearly defined. I think it ought to be "the south wing" of the Capitol extension. If my friend will allow that amendment to be made, I think there will be no objection to it

Mr. MERRIMON. What does the Senator suggest?
Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to insert instead of the words "that portion of the Capitol set apart for the use of the House and its officers" the words "the south wing of the Capitol extension." We know exactly what that means.

Mr. MERRIMON. I understood—and that was the understanding of the committee—that those portions of the Capitol that the House had control of were well ascertained, well defined, and that there will be no doubt about that. I will mention, furthermore, that it was not deemed wise to put into this resolution all the details the committee had an understanding about, how the tickets should be issued or what should be put upon them, or that a certain ticket should be provided. A portion was set apart for the diplomatic gallery, a portion was set apart for the President, but to the rest of the gallery everybody is to be admitted who shall have a ticket.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend does not catch my idea. The Senator from Maine says that all south of the Rotunda is under the guardianship of the House of Representatives. That includes the old Hall of the House, the place where the statuary is to be found, and might exclude visiting citizens from seeing the ordinary sights in the Capitol. I do not think there is any intention to do that, and if the resolution is intended simply to protect the place where this ceremony is to go on it should be confined to the wing of the House and not to other portions of the Capitol, which ought to be open to the public.

Mr. MERRIMON. The wing of the House embraces I suppose the corridors around it, and the lobbies.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, it embraces those.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will mention to the Senator that the police force has been increased by a hundred additional police, who have been ordered for the purpose of keeping order through the Capitol and enabling everybody to see what may be seen outside of the Hall of Representatives and its galleries. Gentlemen who seem to be very familiar with the House of Representatives and its appendages thought the language of the resolution was the proper language to accomplish that purpose

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I wish to understand if the words "Members of the House" are under-wish to understand it the words "Members of the House" are understood as including the Delegates?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] Does the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] suggest an amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw it for the present.

The amendment of Mr. HAMLIN was agreed to.
Mr. SHERMAN. I will now submit the amendment I suggested. I do it simply to define the part embraced. If the Senator objects to it I do not care anything about it.

Mr. MERRIMON. The purpose of the committee, I say again, was simply to take immediate control and exclusive control of the Hall of whole of that wing to the carrying out of that arrangement. I move to strike out the words "that portion of the Capitol set apart for the use of the House and its officers" and insert "the south wing of the Capitol extension;" so as to read:

That during the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, no persons besides those who now have the privilege of the floor of the House of Representatives shall be admitted to the south wing of the Capitol extension, except upon tickets to be issued by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, and that the tickets to be issued under this resolution shall be distributed equally to each Senator and Representative by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. MERRIMON. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that that excludes persons from the corridors, from the restaurant-rooms, and from many places not connected with the Hall of the House of Rep-

Mr. SHERMAN. The great trouble is that the words proposed by the Senator from North Carolina are indefinite and uncertain. According to the Senator from Maine they would cover all that part of the Capitol building lying south of the Rotunda, and would exclude the people of the United States who come here to see the Capitol from the Old Hall of the House and the restaurant and all those places. As I propose to amend the resolution I think it confines the operation of the rule simply to the Hall in which these proceedings are held. I do not want to interfere with a matter of this kind. If the Senator desires let him say "the Hall of the House of Representatives and the galleries," but make it as liberal as possible and let the people roam through this building as much as possible.

Mr. MERRIMON. I concur in that very heartily, but we thought we had accomplished that purpose exactly.

Mr. HAMLIN. And accomplished more. Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to say that if this resolution is amended we shall have to change the form of it and make it a concurrent resolution so that our action may go to the House for concurrence.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would be better.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is not this a concurrent resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not purport to be.

Mr. HAMLIN. It ought to be. It is hardly proper that a resolution of this body should say what should be the action at the other end of

Mr. MERRIMON. If I may state the fact, a resolution like this will be reported to the House for the concurrence of that body.

Mr. HAMLIN. This resolution should be changed to a concurrent resolution.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have no objection to that. Mr. HAMLIN. It should read, "Resolved by the Senate, the House concurring

Mr. MERRIMON. I submit in that case it would require the aproval of the President.

Mr. HAMLIN. No; it is a concurrent resolution, not a statute. is simply a concurrent resolution, precisely like the resolution which we passed yesterday in reference to the increase temporarily of the police force

Mr. MERRIMON. I take it that a concurrent resolution, technically speaking, is a joint resolution, and a joint resolution has the force and effect of a statute and must be approved by the President.

Mr. HAMLIN. This is a concurrent resolution which is in the nature of a rule. The President does not want to sign it to give it effect any more than he would have anything to do with the planetary system.

Mr. SHERMAN.

Mr. SHERMAN. It falls within the nature of a rule.
Mr. MERRIMON. So it does; but the Constitution provides that every resolution which requires the concurrence of both Houses shall every resolution which requires the concurrence of both Houses shall have the approval of the President. I have no objection myself personally to any course that the Senate see proper to take. I presented the result of the deliberation of the two committees and I was instructed to report this result. I have done so and explained the ground upon which they acted, and I am content now to take such course as the Senate may see fit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, to strike out the words "that portion of the Capitol set apart for the use of the House and its officers" and insert "the south wing of the Capitol extension."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to amend by prefixing the concurrent form to the resolution, so as to read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.)

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON subsequently said: On scrutinizing the resolution which has just passed the Senate regulating the manner of issuing tickets on the counting of the electoral votes, I find it does not execute the purpose contemplated at all. On consultation with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who had given the matter considerable consideration, he is content if the Senate shall consent to an amendment that I desire to offer. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to amend the resolution as amended by striking out all after the words "Speaker of the House" where they occur last in the resolution, and inserting what I send to the Clerk's

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the resolution by striking out the following words:

And that the tickets to be issued under this resolution shall be distributed equally to each Senator and Representative by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives.

And insert in lieu of those words the following:

And the tickets, as assigned by the Committees on Rules of the Senate and House of Representatives to be issued to Senators and Representatives and others, shall be distributed by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives.

So as to read, if amended:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That during the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President no persons besides those who now have the privilege of the floor of the House of Representatives shall be admitted to the south wing of the Capitol extension, except upon tickets to be issued by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House; and the tickets as assigned by the Committees on Rules of the Senate and House of Representatives to be issued to Senators and Representatives and others shall be distributed by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will just make one remark. If the resolution stands as it was first adopted it would exclude the judges of the Supreme Court, the President, the General of the Army, and many other persons who ought to have tickets, from having tickets at all. The object of this amendment is to obviate that difficulty.

Mr. ALLISON. Under this resolution how are the tickets distributed, equally to the Senate and the House?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir; and to certain other persons who are embraced as well, the judges of the Supreme Court, Cabinet officers, and generals of the Army.

Mr. WINDOM. Are not those officials entitled to the floor now?

Mr. MERRIMON. They are entitled to the floor; but their families would not be entitled to the benefit of the gallery unless this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. WINDOM. I did not understand the argument of the Sena-

Mr. DAWES. Is it the understanding of the Senator from North Carolina that the tickets distributed among Senators and Representatives are to be distributed equally?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.
Mr. DAWES. I did not hear that in the amendment.
Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the proposition as it will stand as amend-The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as proposed to be amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON ELECTORAL BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print 10,000 additional copies of the President's mes-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution as referred to the committee is in the following words:

Resolved, That 10,000 additional copies of the message of the President of the United States announcing his approval of the act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The committee report to strike out "10,000" and insert "2,500." Mr. THURMAN. Instead of 10,000 copies? Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir. Mr. THURMAN. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. Mr. SHERMAN. My colleague will remember that that message

Mr. SHERMAN. My colleague will remember that that message has been published in every newspaper in the United States; it has been published in every newspaper in Ohio.

Mr. MERRIMON. What is that?

Mr. SHERMAN. The President's short message approving the electoral bill. I have no doubt a million copies by this time have been printed, and it is merely a waste of the public money to print it at all in this form. I do not see any use in printing it; everybody has read it. It is short and will not occupy more than a page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; yet you cannot send it out without paying a cent postage on it; and, as it has been printed in every newspaper in the United States, I think the printing of 2,500 copies is a useless expenditure, but it will not cost much.

ADVANCEMENT IN THE NAVY.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1068) to repeal certain portions of the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to advancement in the Navy, to report it without amendment; and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceded to consider the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to have the Senator from Rhode Island explain the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. The present provision of law authorizes the President to nominate to the Senate for advancement in his grade any officer of the Navy thirty numbers for extraordinary heroism in the late war. The time has come when all the officers who manifested extraordinary heroism have been rewarded, and some who did not; and the opinion of the committee is that such applications should

Mr. BOUTWELL. What is the section?
Mr. ANTHONY. Section 1506.
Mr. BOGY. I should like to know what is section 1506. I could not hear the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. SARGENT. As the Senator from Rhode Island has said, after the close of the war and with a desire to reward persons who had been exceptionally gallant in battle, Congress made a provision that naval officers might be advanced not to exceed thirty numbers provided they had shown such exceptional heroism. A good many years have elapsed since that time. Quite a number of persons, by the regulation of boards and otherwise and on the recommendation of the executive officers, have been advanced. Perhaps some cases have happened where persons not strictly coming within this definition have had the benefit of this statute. The committee have had cases of that kind before them for quite a long while and have almost uniformly reported against them. Occasionally cases still come up, very doubtful in propriety. Persons take advantage of the statute to urge their claims and to bring influences to bear upon the committees and the executive department, which ought not to be favorably considered. To avoid annoyance to the executive department in such cases and going before the committee, as there is very little more that ought to be done, and perhaps nothing more ought to be done in this direction, it is proposed that the law be repealed. It was intended for temporary operation, and it has perhaps performed all the beneficial results. Mr. SARGENT. As the Senator from Rhode Island has said, after or temporary operation, and it has perhaps performed all the beneficial results ever anticipated from it.

Mr. BOGY. Does this bill come from a committee?

Mr. SARGENT. It comes from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In reading this section of the statute it does not appear to have had special reference to the late war. It says:

Any officer of the Navy may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be advanced, not exceeding thirty numbers in rank, for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle or extraordinary heroism.

It seems to me that is a section of law that ought to stand. I submit it is no reason for the repeal of the law to say that the Secretary of the Navy or the President or the Senate may be importuned for advancement by those who are not entitled to advancement or by advancement by those who are not entitled to advancement or by the friends of such persons. It does seem to me that if we are to have a Navy there should be an opportunity for rewarding the per-sons by making them conspicuous among their associates and before the country for unusual courage in battle or extraordinary heroism under other circumstances that might occur in time of peace, as disaster to a vessel or crews or individual men in danger who might be rescued by the extraordinary heroism of officers of the Navy. I shall feel compelled for one to vote against its repeal.

Mr. LOGAN. What is the proposition, to repeal that section?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The proposition is to repeal the section which reads thus:

Any officer of the Navymay, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be advanced, not exceeding thirty numbers in rank, for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle or extraordinary heroism.

It does not relate to the late war.

Mr. LOGAN. The repeal of this section then leaves it in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy to make this advancement without the consent of the Senate?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. LOGAN. What is it then?

Mr. SARGENT. It simply takes away the power. This act was passed April 21, 1864. It was passed in view of the war in which we were then engaged, and because some persons had shown exceptional gallantry. There was no other occasion to display exceptional gallantry except in that war; and if we allow the statute to remain in time of peace the effect will be to cause all the naval officers who of peace the effect will be to cause all the naval officers who might consider that they had rendered something a little out of the line of ordinary duty to try to get above each other, to emulate the example of persons at English fairs climbing a greased pole, where each is trying to pull down the other and climb over him, and it tends each is trying to pull down the other and climb over him, and it tends to demoralize the service very much more than it would to repeal a law which gives exceptional advancement for such conduct.

It is not the policy of the Navy or of the country in time of peace that such a statute should exist. It was passed for the exceptional purpose of rewarding persons who during the late war had shown nnexampled gallantry or rendered unequaled service to the country. The date of the statute and the time at which it was passed show that that was its whole object. It has worked all the results that it was intended to work, and now it is applied, or attempted to be applied to eases which would not commend themselves. I think to the plied, to cases which would not commend themselves I think to the favor of the Senate.

It is not a mere question of avoiding annoyance to the executive officers or to Congress, but such things do slip through and there are some persons who avail themselves of opportunities of getting undue influence. It has been my observation that some persons not entitled to advancement are placed in advance of those entitled to rank which others have succeeded in getting over their heads, and thus getting far advanced on the lists to the prejudice of others who should not have been disturbed. It simply encourages lobbying on the part of naval officers in Washington in order to get this exceptional advantage. We not only advance by the act of advancement, but sometage. We not only advance by the act of advancement, but some-body else must be degraded, and to have a shifting naval list like that is injurious to the interests of the service. It creates jealousy among the officers; it creates a sense of injustice among those over whose heads men are advanced. The result of the law in my judgment has been disastrous so far as the operations of the last two or three years are concerned, and I think we ought to terminate a condition of things not calculated to benefit the Navy and strive to increase the self-respect and the sense of justice among the officers.

Mr. THURMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope the vote will be allowed to be taken on this bill.

this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. THURMAN. I will yield to further morning business.

Mr. PATTERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1208) for the relief of William Talbert, of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THE OSAGE INDIANS.

Mr. BOGY. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 452) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes. This amendment was handed to me by the delegation of the Osage Indians, and I think is a most important amendment. Attaching great importance to it, I shall read it to the Senate:

Strike out all after and including the words "of which amount," in line 726, page 0, down to and including the words "per capita," in line 727, page 30, and insert the following:

And that no expenditure of any of the foregoing sums appropriated for the Osage Indians shall be expended except for such objects and in such amounts as the Osage national council shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, direct, and the proper officers are hereby authorized and directed to execute the resolution passed on the 26th of June, 1873, by the Osage national council and approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the 8th of July, 1874, for the payment of the balance of the debt as fixed and limited by said resolution out of the proceeds of the sales of the Osage lands now in the custody of the United States: Provided, The authorized authorities of the Osage Nation request the payment of the same: And provided further, That the agent of the Osage Indians shall not retain or appoint any person as an employé of his agency other than persons belonging to the Osage Nation except for sufficient reason, to be first certified to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and approved by him.

The object of the amendment I will state. The Osage Indians have made some progress in civilization. A large proportion of their money which has heretofore been appropriated has been wasted. Within which has heretofore been appropriated has been wasted. Within the last few years perhaps more than a million of dollars have been appropriated, and there is nothing to show for that large amount. While they desire hereafter that these expenditures shall be made by the Secretary of the Interior, they also wish to be consulted. I think it a most important step in the way of progress toward their elevation, and will give to them great protection from the rapacity and robbery to which they have heretofore been subjected.

I will state that the delegation now in the city, at whose head is the chief (governor) of the tribe, are intelligent men. The chief himself is an educated man, speaks good English, and is civilized and of very fine intelligence, and known to be a man of character and standing at home. I look upon this matter as very important. It is an object at home. I look upon this matter as very important. It is an object which I have been trying to accomplish for some years as the only way to secure some protection from misapplication of the money which is annually appropriated by Government for their benefit, and which has always been shamefully wasted.

There is another object. There is a claim pending against those Indians in favor of two persons named Vann and Adair. It has been pending against the Indians for a long time. They admit the claim to be legitimate, but they wish to be consulted as to the amount. They are fearful that it may be allowed without being consulted. They are fearful that it may be allowed without being consulted. They therefore pray that the Secretary of the Interior shall be authorized to pass upon this claim subject to their approval, and I think this should be done. They are anxious that the claim should be paid. should be done. They are anxious that the claim should be paid. They admit that they are indebted to these persons, who rendered very great service at a most critical time, and by which a very large sum of money was saved to them. Therefore, while they are willing that the Secretary of the Interior should pass upon this claim and make an allowance, they desire to be consulted as to the amount which may be allowed. As the matter stands now, it is competent for the Secretary to allow it at any time and pay it out of the Indian fund. I move that this amendment be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. tee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. George M. Adams, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate providing for the appointment of special police at the Capitol to serve during the canvassing of the votes for President and Vice-President; and also in the resolution of the Senate relative to admissions to the south wing of the Capitol extension during the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1558) to remove the political disabilities of Robert Ransom, of Virginia; and the bill (H. R. No. 2736) to remove the political disabilities of N. H. Van Zandt,

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to make a change of reference of a bill referred by mistake. House bill No. 4554 for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, was referred by order of the Senate last evening to the Committee on Appropriations. I think it was intended to have gone to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I move that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD ACTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 984) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] yesterday was interrupted somewhat toward its conclusion by proceedings of which the Senate is cognizant. I understand from him that he scarcely had the opportunity to make an explanation in regard to one of the sections of the bill of the Committee on the Judiciary such as he desired and I viold to him now to give tee on the Judiciary such as he desired, and I yield to him now to give him that opportunity, but shall claim the floor at the conclusion of his remarks

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not want to trespass upon the politeness of the Senator from Louisiana too much, and therefore I politeness of the Schator from Louisiana too much, and therefore I shall speak very briefly. I beg the attention of Schators to what I shall say, and I shall take very little time about it. I am induced to speak because I find by conversation with some Schators that the statement made by me yesterday was misunderstood, and it is important that that misunderstanding should be removed. I was understood as saying that the Judiciary Committee bill takes 25 per cent. of the netearnings of these railroad companies and puts that 25 per cent. in a sinking fund. I did not intend to make any such statement as that. The bill does not take 25 per cent. of the net earnings of the roads. that. The bill does not take 25 per cent. of the net earnings of the roads for a sinking fund but a much less per cent. than 25 per cent. To understand this, it is necessary to advert to the provision of the existing law. Under the law as it now stands each company is to pay to the Government annually 5 per cent. upon its net earnings and that money thus paid, to wit, 5 per cent., is applied by the Government immediately toward re-imbursing the Government for the interest which the Government paid for these companies on the bonds it has loaned them, and thereby saves the Government from the loss of in-terest upon so much of the money which it has paid for these compa-nics. In the same way as the law now stands it authorizes the Gov-ernment to retain one-half of the transportation account, as it is called, that is, the account which these companies have from year to year against the Government for services rendered to it in the transportation of soldiers and munitions of war and property of all kinds, and one-half of the transportation account is also presently applicable to the re-imbursement of the Government for the interest which it pays annually for the companies annually for the companies.

The bill now under consideration does not alter those provisions of law in the slightest degree. To take that 5 per cent. and the one-half of the transportation account, which under existing law is immediately applicable to re-imburse the Government for the interest it pays for these companies, would be to make the Government lose interest upon the amount of those two sums from now until the maturity of the bonds in 1898, a period of twenty-one years. So this bill does no such thing as that, but it preserves those two provisions of the existing law, and then requires that in addition to those payments such further payments shall be made to be credited to a sinking fund such further payments shall be made to be credited to a sinking fund as with those payments now provided for by existing law will make 25 per cent. of the net earnings of the companies, with a proviso in effect that with respect to the Union Pacific they shall not in any year be required to pay more than $1,500,000, counting the money which is immediately applicable to refund the Government, its payment of interest, and also the amount which has to go into the sinking fund. I can make this very clear to everybody's comprehension, who will listen to me, in one moment. Let us take the Central Pacific Company and suppose its earnings to be in round numbers what they have been for some years, $8,000,000, 25 per cent. of that would be $2,000,000. $2,000,000.

Mr. WEST. If I do not interrupt the Senator, he certainly includes in that amount the total earnings of the entire length of the Central Pacific Railroad, only two-thirds of which has ever been subsidized Pacific Railroad, only two-thirds of which law to be the Government.

Mr. THURMAN. It will answer for my illustration.

Mr. WEST. I only want to take exception to that statement.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not going into the mooted question whether or not it is 5 per cent. of the entire earnings of the company or 5 per cent. only of the earnings of that portion of the road which is bonded and subsidized.

bonded and subsidized.

Mr. WEST. This is for illustration, I understand?

Mr. THURMAN. For illustration, and it will answer just as well upon either interpretation of the charter, suppose the net earnings of the Central Pacific to be $8,000,000, 25 per cent. of that would be $2,000,000. Now we do not require the company to pay $2,000,000 into the Treasury; we require it in a case like that only to pay one million and a half of dollars. How are those one million and a half of dollars to be paid? What elements compose it? In the first place there would be $400,000 in 5 per cent. on its net earnings, which $400,000 would be applied under our bill just as it is under the present law, to the immediate re-imbursement of the Government of so ent law, to the immediate re-imbursement of the Government of so much interest paid by it for the Government. Then there would be another half of the transportation account which, under the existing another half of the transportation account which, under the existing law, is also immediately applicable to the payment of the interest. That is $240,000. I only take that for convenience, because that will make just exactly 3 per cent. Then you would have 8 per cent. of its net earnings which that company, under existing law, is required to pay and which is immediately applicable by the Government to re-imburse itself the interest it has paid for the company. That would take 8 per cent. of its earnings. Now we require the company to pay 17 per cent. more for a sinking fund, making 25 per cent, which would be in the case supposed $860,000 which the company would have to pay. In this $860,000 is included half the transportation account for the Government which under the existing law is to be paid over to the Government. It may all be called as part of its net earnings. It is no use to distinguish them at all. So you see that the bill of the Judiciary Committee leaves the law to stand, so far as that law requires payment, which would go to the re-imbursement of the Government for interest paid by it, and it saves the Government from loss of interest upon just that money for the twenty-one years or the loss of interest upon just that money for the twenty-one years or the twenty-two years that these bonds have yet to run, and that the amount of their net earnings which we take from them out of which to create a sinking fund would not in all probability in respect of any one of those companies amount to more than 17 per cent. of their net earnings. I hope that that explanation makes the provisions of the bill perfectly clear and corrects the misapprehension that I created yesterday in the haste of speaking by perhaps an unguarded expres-

Now, Mr. President, one word more before the Senator from Louisiana proceeds. My colleague [Mr. Sherman] suggested an amendment which I think on reflection he will hardly press, because the effect of it would be to deprive the Government of the right to apply the 5 per cent. which it is now entitled to receive and immediately apply, and the half-transportation account which it is now entitled to retain and immediately apply to re-imburse itself. His amendment would transfer that 5 per cent. and that half-transportation account to the sinking fund, and would thereby deprive the Government of interest upon just the amount of those two sums for twenty-one years. Of course my colleague did not intend that, and I do not think he will press the amendment.

One word upon the funding scheme of the Railroad Committee's bill. I said yesterday that that postponed the payment of this debt indefinitely. A Senator said to me, "You are mistaken, because it provides for a sinking fund by an accumulation of interest, interest provides for a sinking rund by an accumulation of interest, interest compounded, and it would take but a small sum of compounded interest to pay off the national debt in a very short period of time, especially if you are to add the principal of that sum every year, as the Railroad Committee bill proposes." But, Mr. President, of all the curious devices that ever I have seen for paying a debt, with great respect to that committee, their plan is the most curious. There is an old play that has anywed many of us in reading and classic. is an old play that has amused many of us in reading and also in seeing it acted, called "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," but the author of that play never in his fertile imagination conceived so fine a way to pay old debts as I humbly submit is this plan of a sinking fund, according to the bill of the Railroad Committee. How is it? I shall speak pay old debts as I humbly submit is this plan of a sinking fund, according to the bill of the Railroad Committee. How is it I shall speak but a few minutes longer in order to show you. We pay for these railroad companies in interest over $3,000,000 every year, and we get no interest upon the amount which we thus pay; and, unless my interpretation of the law should be incorrect, when the final settlement comes at the maturity of the bonds, then we shall be entitled to that interest upon these installments of interest paid by us for the time they were paid respectively; but that is a mooted question. I am free to say it is not a question perfectly free from doubt; but at all events, whether I am right or whether I am wrong in that, for twenty-one years we get no interest upon these $3,000,000 which we each year pay. The Railroad Committee bill says to the Government, "You pay for us $3,000,000 in this year of grace 1877, and we will pay you no interest upon the $3,000,000 which you thus pay, but we will make a partial payment of that sum; we will pay one million and a half of dollars, and you shall put that to our credit in the Treasury and allow us compound interest upon it every six months, and thus by that kind of computation we will have paid off our debt by the time the twenty-one years have expired." I think very likely you would, but of all the ways of paying a debt that ever I saw in my life, the idea that you shall take the principal of a debt and compute no interest on it, and take each partial payment and put compound interest on that—I say of all the modes of paying debts that ever I have seen that is the most novel and to me the most frightful. I have said all that I desired to say.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I approach the consideration of this subject with both embarrassment and anxiety: anxiety that legislation involving so large an amount shall be wise and judicious, maintaining the interests of the Government, and, in the language of one of the statutes itself, "having due regard for the rights o tion involving so large an amount shall be wise and judicious, maintaining the interests of the Government, and, in the language of one of the statutes itself, "having due regard for the rights of the companies" affected; embarrassment that within my-experience this is the first occasion where two committees of this body have been intrusted with the consideration of a similar and indeed the same subject, and reported diametrically diverse propositions on a fundamental principle, as I shall proceed to show. The real features of this bill, the real results to be attained by the adoption of either one or the other projects, differ but little; and as much money will accrue to the credit of these companies for the liquidation of their indebtedness to the Government of the United States by one bill almost as by the other. I am also somewhat diffident of being assigned by virtue the other, I am also somewhat diffident of being assigned by virtue of my position on this committee the laboring oar in maintaining a cause both of law and fact against that committee which stands pre-eminent in the existence of this body for its legal acumen and opin-ion. In what I shall say I shall ask the consideration of the Senate more to the authorities I shall offer than to any original ideas I may myself advance. If I controvert the attitude and position taken by the Indicious Committee of to day I shall find myself sustained by the Judiciary Committee of to-day, I shall find myself sustained by a preceding opinion of that same committee diametrically opposite to what they now recommend. If I centrovert the position assumed by the Law Committee of this body, I shall be sustained by the opinion of the highest tribunal in the land, that tribunal to which this nation now appeals for security in its hour of distress and tribulation: the Supreme Court of the United States. Not to me will I ask Senators to listen, but I ask them to listen to the edicts and mandates of the highest court in the land, which I contend has virtually decided this

No remark that fell from the Senator from Ohio perhaps had as much weight with all of us as when he said we should approach the consideration of this subject with extreme care; that if we ventured upon either its consideration or to vote upon it without due reflection, ample time to think and to examine, we might commit a very grave error. What were his words? Speaking of the disposition and action of the Committee on Railroads, he says:

I know their ability; I know their disposition to see that justice is done to the Government; but I know another thing, that this subject is one that requires long and careful study, and that he who undertakes to frame a bill upon it without long and careful study, and without familiarity with all its details, will necessarily fall into some error like this.

To that opinion, Mr. President, there can be no dissent, and although in the agitation of the moment the Senate is little disposed to give its attention to the remarks that may be submitted to it by to give its attention to the remarks that may be submitted to it by either one Senator or the other, yet before we vote upon this question we should consider with ourselves how far we are rightfully protecting the interests of the Government of the United States, and whether we are not, by the very action that is recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, actually imperiling the whole of this debt, absolutely putting it beyond the power of the Government of the United States ever to be refunded one single dollar of this $150,000,000 that will be owing to us by these companies.

It was the conclusion at which the Committee on Railroads arrived that the legislation which they recommended was the only legislation

It was the conclusion at which the Committee on Kallroads arrived that the legislation which they recommended was the only legislation that would enable the Government to recover this money; that if the bill of the Committee on the Judiciary was passed the companies must be compelled to resist its being put into effect, and if the decision was adverse to the Government—which we had reason to believe it would be from the pregnant outgivings of the Supreme Court—that this money would be irrecoverably lost by improvident legislation.

The two bills, the one of the Judiciary Committee and the other of the Committee on Railroads, differ in these respects: The first provides a measure of forcing the commanies against their will to create vides a measure of forcing the companies against their will to create a sinking fund for the payment of indebtedness not yet due; the second proceeds on the principle of procuring the companies voluntarily to agree to provide such sinking fund. That is the fundamental difference between the bills of the two committees, although in absolute and actual fact the amounts to be paid by the different processes differ, as I shall show, very little. Now, there are some principles of law that cover this matter which I desire to refer to somewhat

There is a vast difference between a franchise granted by a State or by the United States to a corporation simply for corporate purposes, to enable it to act as a corporate body, or a simple grant of a right of way and right to build and use a railroad or other work of internal improvement, where the only benefit to the granting power is the general benefit to the public, and the case of such grants to a corporation created or assisted for the express purpose of benefiting the granting power. In the first case the grants are for the sole benefit of the corporation, and, under all the decisions, the acts containing the grant are to be construed strictly against the grantee. But in the second case two elements enter: one, that of the franchise to act as a corporation or to use a right of way or other substantial act as a corporation or to use a right of way or other substantial right granted, and the other a contract in which, in consideration of the franchises and rights conferred upon the grantee, it agrees to do certain acts and perform certain services for the benefit of the grantor. In granting the franchises the Congress of the United States or the State Legislature acts as a sovereign power. In so far as the acts are contracts, the sovereign power is relinquished and the sovereign becomes a contractor, puts itself on a par with its subject, becomes a party to the agreement, and is bound by the same rules of law and is subject to the same duties and obligations as the other party to the contract. other party to the contract.

There is something pertinent to that proposition, Mr. President, in an opinion that I hold in my hand delivered by Mr. Justice Grier, the predecessor of Justice Strong on the Supreme Bench, in a case in New Jersey. The justice, in alluding to the sovereignty of the United States and its exercise in like premises, uses this language:

The Government of the United States, though limited in its powers, is supreme in its sphere of action. But its rights as a sovereign and its prerogatives as such are co-extensive with the functions of government committed to them, and extend no further. Its position as to prerogative is anomalous, owing to our peculiar in

In the mere exercise of a corporate right the Government of the United States cannot claim the prerogatives or immunities of a sovereign. She cannot compel a mortgagee to the hopeless remedy of a petition to Congress to redeem.

That is what this bill does most assuredly. It compels the first mortgagees, holding the first lien upon the property of these companies, to depend upon such subsequent action of Congress as it may seem wise and judicious to adopt to re-imburse them their money.

The justice continues to say-when the Government of the United States becomes a partner in a trading cor-

I shall contend, Mr. President, that the Government of the United States did enter into partnership with these railroad companies to build the railroad for the benefit and interest of the Government of the United States, and the Government thereby became a partner under limitations in a trading corporation "such as the United States Bank, it divested itself so far as concerned the transactions of that company of its sovereign character, and took that of a citizen."

The cases that have been cited by the Judiciary Committee in support of their view of the law in this case have no analogy whatever to the circumstances attending the organization and the existence of these companies. There never has been an instance, either in State or national legislation within my knowledge, where the Government became a partner in a railroad company until this one, and every case that they either it is a case outside of the interests of the Government. that they cite is a case outside of the interests of the Government and where the Government has intervened to adjudicate between two conflicting interests, in which the sovereign power had no concern.

There is not one of the cases that is cited by the Committee on the Judiciary that has such elements in the organization of the companies as those I have mentioned.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to show the gain and advantage derived from the construction of this road. I desire to show that it is admitted by the courts that have adjudicated this question that such was the fact, and to maintain the proposition that I have laid down that the Government became a copartner in these roads and so has abandoned its rights of sovereignty.

But these acts of 1862 and 1864-

Says the Court of Claims in its decision of what is known as the Union Pacific Railroad case contain something more than provisions to create a corporation and confer upon it franchises and grants. The statutes really embody both a charter and a compact. As to those provisions which create the corporation, which limit its rights and franchises, which prescribe its obligations to the public, and confer grants and benefits upon it, the statutes are nothing more than a charter; but as to those provisions which bind the Government to do something, which cast distinct obligations upon it, which carry it into the region of mercantile transactions, and make it take a financial part in the enterprise, the statutes belong to that class of legislation which is to be so construed as to carry out the liberal and just intent of the Legislature.

I shall now read somewhat at length from the opinion of the Supreme Court in this case, rendered in the October term, 1875, which has presented to the consideration of Congress the relations with these companies in an entirely different phase from what had hitherto been contemplated. The opinion of that court alone read from this place, and given proper attention to by the Senate, is an ample refutal itself of the propositions contained in the bill of the Committee on the Judiciary. It is scarcely compiled with that system that enables the reader to condense its opinion upon any one particular question; and as I read it to the Senate I shall not confine myself to the text consecutively, but I shall take such portions of it as bear upon the view that I desire to maintain. I know the Senate would much rather hear what the opinion of the Supreme Court is upon this question than they would hear mine.

Many of the provisions in the original act of 1862 are outside of the usual course I shall now read somewhat at length from the opinion of the upon this question than they would hear mine.

Many of the provisions in the original act of 1862 are outside of the usual course of legislative action concerning grants to railroads, and cannot be properly construed without reference to the circumstances which surrounded Congress when the act was passed. The war of the rebellion was in progress, and the country had become alarmed for the safety of the Pacific States, owing to complications with England. In case these complications resulted in an open rupture, the loss of our Pacific possessions was feared, but, even if this fear were groundless, it was quite apparent that we were unable to furnish that degree of protection to the people occupying them which every government owes its citizens. It is true that threatened danger was happily averted, but wisdom pointed out the necessity of making suitable provision for the future. This could be done in no better way than by the construction of a railroad across the continent. Such a road would bind together the widely separated parts of our common country, and furnish a cheap and expeditious mode for the transportation of troops and supplies. And if it did nothing more than afford the required protection to the Pacific States, it was felt that the Government, in the execution of a plain duty, could not justly withhold the aid necessary to build it. And so strong and pervading was this opinion that it is by no means certain the people would not have sanctioned the action of Congress, if it had departed from the traditional policy of the country regarding works of internal improvements, and charged the Government itself with the direct execution of the enterprise.

This enterprise was viewed as a national undertaking for national purposes, and the public mind was directed to the end to be accomplished rather than the ratio.

This enterprise was viewed as a national undertaking for national purposes, and the public mind was directed to the end to be accomplished rather than the particular means employed for the purpose. Although this road was a military necessity—

The assumption on the part of the Judiciary Committee is, that this road was built for the railroad companies. This road was built for the Government of the United States to meet its necessities—for the Government of the United States to meet its necessities—

Although this road was a military necessity, there were other reasons active at the time in producing an opinion for its completion besides the protection of an exposed frontier. There was a vast unpeopled territory lying between the Missouri and Sacramento Rivers which was practically worthless without the facilities afforded by a railroad for the transportation of person and property. With its construction the agricultural and mineral resources of this territory could be developed; settlements made where settlements were possible, and thereby the wealth and power of the United States essentially increased. And there was also the pressing want, in times of peace even, of an improved and cheaper method for the transportation of the mails and supplies for the Army and the Indians.

It was in the presence of these facts that Congress undertook to deal with the subject of this railroad. The difficulties in the way of building it were great, and by many intelligent persons considered insurmountable.

Although a free people, when resolved upon a course of action, can accomplish great results, the scheme for building a railroad two thousand miles in length, over deserts, across mountains, and through a country inhabited by Indians jealous of intrusion upon their rights, was universally esteemed at the time to be a bold and hazardous undertaking. It is nothing to the purpose that the difficulties in the way of the undertaking, after trial, in a great measure disappeared, and that the road was constructed at less cost of time and money than was considered possible. No argument can be drawn from the wisdom that comes after the fact. Congress acted with reference to a state of things supposed to exist at the time, and no aid can be derived, in the interpretation of its legislation, from the consideration that the theory on which it proceeded turned out not to be correct. The project of building the road was not conceived for private ends, and the prevalent

The United States, desiring the construction of the road and Congress being of opinion that it could not constitutionally enter upon this work, made a contract with the railroad company, and availed itself of its corporate existence to construct that road for the benefit and use of the people of the United States, and not for the benefit of a railroad company:

Even if this were not so, reasons of economy suggested that it were better to enlist private capital and individual enterprise in the project. This Congress undertook to do, and the inducements held out were such as it was believed would procure the requisite capital and enterprise. But the purpose in presenting these inducements was to promote the construction and operation of a work deemed essential to the security of great public interests.

It is true the scheme contemplated profit to individuals, for, without reasonable expectation of this, capital could not be obtained, nor the requisite skill and enterprise; but this consideration does not in itself change the relation of the parties to this suit. This might have been so if the Government had incorporated a company to advance private interests, and agreed to aid it on account of supposed incidental advantages which would accrue to the public from the completion of the enterprise. But the Government proceeded on a wholly different theory. It promoted the enterprise to advance its own interests, and endeavored to enlist private capital and individual enterprise as a means to an end, the securing a road which could be used for governmental purposes.

Indeed, the whole act contains unmistakable evidence that, if Congress was put to the necessity of accomplishing a great public enterprise through the instrumentality of private corporations, it took care that there should be no misunderstanding about the objects to be accomplished or the motives which influenced its course of

Of necessity there were risks to be taken in aiding with money or bonds an enterprise unparalleled in the history of any free people, which, if completed at all, would require, as was supposed, twelve years in which to do it. But these risks were common to both parties.

I particularly ask attention to that phrase that "these risks were common to both parties." Who ever heard of a government or a sovereign state risking anything in conferring a franchise upon a railroad company? It is evident that the Supreme Court takes an entirely different view of this case:

And Congress was obliged to assume its share and advance the bonds or abandon the enterprise, for obviously the grant of lands, however valuable after the road was built, could not be available as a resource with which to build it.

We have the same reasons in reports made to the Senate, besides the We have the same reasons in reports made to the Senate, besides the general opinion given by the Supreme Court that these roads were necessary to maintain the unity of the Government. We have some financial and monetary reasons, some reasons in the direction of frugality and of economy that instigated the Government to this action when it passed those bills and created those companies and subsidized them with lands and with bonds.

In a report of the Senate, No. 374, Forty-first Congress, third session, after going into detail at large of the expenses of maintaining communication with the Pacific coast, in discussing the charge that was entailed mount the Government by the transportation of its mails was entailed upon the Government by the transportation of its mails, its munitions of war, its troops, and in maintaining surveillance over the Indian tribes, the report shows that the absolute expenditure for transportation alone was $8,000,000 a year. Then in order to relieve the Government of such an excessive and onerous charge in that dithe Government of such an excessive and onerous charge in that direction, the Government aided these roads, became a partner in the transaction of their business, with limitations, and to-day the expense is only 10 per cent. of that amount. The Government has received the benefit of a reduction from $8,000,000 annual expenditure to $800,000 now for the same objects. Did not the Government, in the language of Mr. Justice Grier, become "a partner in a trading corporation;" and in the language of the Supreme Court, "for its own interest, for its own objects, and for its own benefit?"

The Senate Judiciary Committee in the same volume, and indeed interest, for its own objects, and for its own benefit?"

The Senate Judiciary Committee in the same volume, and indeed in the next report, No. 375, admit—the honorable Senator from Ohio who last addressed the Senate on this subject [Mr. Thurman] was then a member of this committee, and he admitted then that this was a work of national importance by the language of this report, and certainly that proposition cannot be controverted by him now.

Now, Mr. President, the question was asked very dogmatically yesterday, what did Congress intend by reserving to itself the power to alter, amend, or repeal; and the Senator from Ohio said that if this power to alter, amend, and repeal did not extend to these particular provisions which are now at issue, what did it extend to? The act incorporating these companies and the second amendatory act, which contains the direct power without qualification to alter, amend, or repeal printed in this pamphlet, fills twenty pages, a bill of twenty-three sections, and the questions at issue now before the Senate only occupy twenty-three lines of those twenty pages and twenty-three sections. Consequently there must have been some other provisions in this bill that Congress intended to apply the repealing power to, sections. Consequently there must have been some other provisions in this bill that Congress intended to apply the repealing power to, and that it did so intend, that it had other means and objects in reserving to itself that power, is evidenced by the fact that in subsequent legislation, to the extent of ten acts, it has altered and amended and repealed the act of 1864, two of those amendatory acts only referring to the subject now at issue and the other eight acts being in regard to the general management of the road. Surely there is scope and power enough there, there is field and exercise enough for that power to answer the question as to what Congress intended and which has shown what it did intend by acting upon this power.

But it is contended, Mr. President, that Congress by that reservation reserved to itself the option to make the bonds granted to these companies payable before maturity. On that subject I desire the Senate to listen to what the Senator from Ohio said in 1871 in a report presented from the Judiciary Committee of this body, in answer to a resolution asking them "to inquire and report whether the railway companies which have received aid in bonds of the United States are lawfully bound to re-imburse the United States for interest paid on such bonds before the maturity of the principal thereof, and, if so, what legislation, if any, is necessary to compel such re-imbursement."

Can any language be more positive, more direct, more unequivocal than that in which this statement is presented for consideration by the Senate? The committee say:

It is evident, from the statutes themselves, that the company is not bound to make any payment in money on account of these bonds, except the 5 per cent. of net proceeds, until the maturity of said bonds, thirty years from their date. And it is equally evident, from the debates in both Houses of Congress when these acts were passed, that it was the intention of Congress so to frame them as to accomplish such result.

That Congress in framing this act was so particular as to put it beyond the power of the Government to ever precipitate the payment of these bonds before maturity. There is the opinion of the committee in 1871, and now they are here with a proposition to compel payment of the bonds at once.

Further the committee say:

The debates in the House are equally instructive; and it is apparent that the com-any was not expected to pay the interest as it should become due.

Not only did the letter of the law require that they should not be paid, but it was the intention as evidenced by the debates that Congress should throw such safeguards around its legislation that it would never after have the power to require a precipitate payment of these bonds before their maturity.

Further what do the committee say:

Further what do the committee say:

It is questionable, however, whether, in a case like this, where the Government, by its legislation, has encouraged the investment of capital in a work of national importance, it would be quite honest, or becoming the dignity of the Government, to shelter itself behind this technical rule of judicial construction. The stockholders of this company might well say that they understood these acts as they were understood by the two Houses of Congress at the time of their passage. It would be rather harsh treatment to twist out of these acts, by refinement of criticism, a construction unfavorable to the company, and directly opposed to what everybody in Congress and out of it understood to be their meaning at the time they were passed and the money invested. But, however this may be, there is ambiguity enough surrounding this act to take it out of the judicial rule before mentioned, and to place it in that class of cases as to which even the judicial courts seek the aid of extraneous circumstances.

Now Mr. President the law proposed by the Judicial Committee.

Now, Mr. President, the law proposed by the Judiciary Committee of this body may be the legislation that we should like to see put into of this body may be the legislation that we should like to see put into effect as against these companies; but, after all, although we are the law-making power, the law-adjudicating power controls, and controls the result of our acts. From the forum of legislation I appeal to the tribunal of adjudication and determination, and the edict of that tritribunal of adjudication and determination, and the edict of that tri-bunal must be respected by everybody in this land. If Senators will take this decision, as I before remarked, and read it, it alone is a com-plete refutation, an unanswerable refutation, of all the propositions that have been discussed by the committee. Let me say that this commit-tee, except in one instance, in all attempts at legislation against these companies have invariably been overruled by the courts of the land. And now here is one more effort to precipitate us into legislation, in-volving time, that may result if adversely determined by the courts against the Government of the United States in the absolute loss of all this property; and to that point I will have eccasion to refer in all this property; and to that point I will have occasion to refer in the course of my remarks. The Supreme Court say:

the course of my remarks. The Supreme Court say:

The words "to pay said bonds at maturity" do not bear the sense which is sought to be attributed to them. They imply, obviously, an obligation to pay both principal and interest when the time fixed for the payment of the principal has passed; but they do not imply an obligation to pay the interest as it accrues and the principal when due. It is one thing to be required to pay principal and interest when the bonds have reached maturity, and a wholly different thing to be required to pay the interest every six months and the principal at the end of thirty years. The obligations are so different that they cannot both grow out of the direct words employed, and it is necessary to superadd other words in order to extend the condition so as to include the payment of semi-annual interest as it falls due. Neither on principle or authority is such a plain departure from the express letter of the statute warranted. And especially is this so when the construction leads to so great an extension of a condition to defeat a grant.

Now, Mr. President, here again is the opinion of the Supreme Court of what was the intention of Congress with reference to the re-imbursement that should be made by these companies of the advances made to them by the Government.

made to them by the Government.

In addition to all that has been said, there is enough in the scheme of the act, and the purposes contemplated by it, to show that Congress never intended to impose on the corporation the obligation to pay current interest. The act was passed in the midst of war, as has been stated, when the means for national defense were deemed inadequate to the wants of the country, and the public mind was alive to the necessity of uniting by iron bands the destiny of the Pacific States with those of the Atlantic. Confessedly the undertaking was outside of the ability of private capital to accomplish, and only by the helping hand of Congress could the problem, difficult of solution under the most favorable circumstances, be worked out. Local business, as a source of profit, could not be expected while the road was in course of construction, on account of the character of the country it traversed; and whether, when completed, as an investment it would prove valuable, was a question for time to determine. But vast as the work was, limited as were the private resources to build it, the growing wants of the country, as well as the existing and future military necessities of the Government, demanded that it be completed. Under the stimulus of these considerations Congress acted. It did not act for the benefit of private persons, nor in their interest, but for an object deemed essential to the security of the country, as well as to the prosperity of the country.

Confirming again the sentiment expressed by Justice Grier, which I quoted here, that Congress became a partner in a trading corporation to protect and provide for its own interests. I shall read further from the opinion of the Supreme Court as to whether Congress parted with its power to provide this sinking fund or not. The language of the Supreme Court is significant of the fact that Congress had in its power once the opportunity to provide for a sinking fund, but it did not choose to do it. In language as plain as can be spoken the court say:

But, if the words "to pay said bonds at maturity" do not give notice that this saction was intended, neither do the other provisions of the sixth section. They created no obligation to keep down the interest, nor were they so intended. The proposition to retain the amount due the company for services rendered, and apply it toward the general indebtedness of the company to the Government, cannot be construed into a requirement that the company shall pay the interest from time to time and the principal when due. It was in the discretion of Congress to make this requirement, and then, as collateral to it, provide a special fund or funds out of which the principal obligation could be discharged.

In other words, saying that it was in the discretion of Congress, had it seen proper to exercise it, to provide for the creation of a sinking fund; but it failed to do it by its legislation, because the court say:

This Congress did not choose to do-

Congress did not choose to provide for the creation of a sinking but rested satisfied with the entire property of the company as security for the ul-timate payment of the principal and interest of the bonds delivered to it.

It did not rest satisfied with the power to alter, amend, and repeal that is contended for by the Judiciary Committee. If such a power that is contended for by the Judiciary Committee. If such a power had remained in Congress after the passage of the act of 1864, would the Supreme Court have used this language? No; but they say Congress did not choose to do it, but by its legislation it forever debarred itself of the opportunity to require these companies to make a sinking fund otherwise than what was provided by the law itself.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I would inquire of the Senator from Louisiana whether he insists that that decision which he has quoted decides anything of that kind? Mr. WEST. By infer By inference and implication it does. It is pregnant with the opinion of the Supreme Court, to my mind, whatever weight it may have with other Senators.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If I may interrupt the Senator, I will ask him whether it is possible the court could have decided any case of that kind when it did not have it before it?

Mr. WEST. The case was before them; and we can judge by the language what was in their minds when they rendered their opinion. language what was in their minds when they rendered their opinion. I do not say the court did decide it; but I say with such an intimation from the Supreme Court shall we venture upon legislation which if decided adversely to the interests of the United States places those interests absolutely at the mercy of these companies?

When this question was up before, in 1871, the Senator from Ohio in sustaining this report said the law was not as he would like to have it, but the question must be determined according to the letter of the law, however adverse it might be to the interests of the Government, and the Senator from Vermont who usually sits at my right ernment, and the Senator from Vermont who usually sits at my right [Mr. EDMUNDS] used this language:

I should be very glad indeed to have the Supreme Court of the United States determine what the law is on this question. If it determines it in favor of the companies, there is an end of the question; if it determines it in favor of the United

And with his usual sarcasm he says-as we cannot suppose it will after the report of our learned brethern on the Judiciary Committee—

He dissented from that report-then of course there will be an end of the question, and all parties will be satisfied.

But it seems, although the question whether these companies should be called upon to pay anything before the maturity of the bonds has been decided adversely to the United States, some other method must be brought up and considered for the purpose of flanking the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. President, a good deal has been said about the act of 1864, that while it conferred additional benefits upon the companies it also imposed limitations and restrictions upon them that more than counterbalanced the advantages which were received by them; and the Senator from Ohio took occasion to say that in 1864 the companies came to Congress and prevailed upon Congress to legislate further in their behalf. I find no record of the companies appealing by petition or otherwise to Congress for this remission in their behalf; but it became evident that the great interests of the Government connected with the vast Pacific coast were paralyzed for want of a connection, and the Government stepped forward itself and said to these companies, "If you will carry out this work of national design and importance and consequence, we will grant you additional facilities; we will grant you further aid, and will make our terms and restrictions upon you less onerous than they were by the original act." The Judiciary Committee in 1871 said:

mittee in 1871 said:

Two years after the passage of this act the company came again to Congress, and represented its inability to build this road without yet more favorable provisions at the hands of Congress; and the debates in both Houses, while the act of 1864 was under consideration, clearly show that Congress understood the effect of the act of 1862 to be that before stated. And in the fifth section of the act of 1864, for the purpose of making more favorable terms to the company, it was, among other things, provided as follows:

"Only one-half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government by said companies shall be required to be applied to the payment of the bonds issued by the Government in aid of the construction of said roads."

It is a well-settled rule of construction that statutes in pari materia are to be constructed together, and the provisions of one may be referred to for the explanation of provisions in the other. Bearing in mind that Congress by the former act designed to encourage investment of capital in this work, and that the act of 1864, as appears from all its provisions, was intended to be yet more favorable to the company, the provision above quoted can be understood in no other sense than that Congress intended to relieve the company from applying more than half of the compensation for services to the payment of bonds, and that the other half should be paid to the company. What possible benefit would this have been to the company if the company was bound to pay that, and a much larger sum, immediately back to the Government to satisfy accruing interest on the bonds?

Now I ask the question what possible benefit could it have been to these companies to enable them to issue a first-mortgage bond having precedence over the mortgage in favor of the Government, if naving precedence over the mortgage in favor of the Government, if in that very same act the Government had in direct terms reserved to itself the privilege of making its mortgage the first? That is the construction put upon it by the Judiciary Committee, that notwith-standing these companies obtained from the governor a waiver of its rights to the extent of a first mortgage, the Government in the same act that conferred that benefit and advantage upon them reserved to itself the power, as it now proposes to do, to make its mortgage take precedence of that granted in the first instance. On this subject the Supreme Court say, in their decision: Supreme Court say, in their decision:

Supreme Court say, in their decision:

Notwithstanding the favorable terms proposed by Congress the road languished, and the effect of this was the amendatory act of 1864. By this the grant of lands was doubled, a second in lieu of a first mortgage accepted by the Government, and a provision inserted that "only one-half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government by said companies (meaning this and the auxiliary companies incorporated at the same time) shall be required to be applied to the payment of the bonds issued by the Government in aid of the construction of said road."

This amendment was, without doubt, intended merely to modify the provision in the original act so as to allow the Government to retain only one-half of the compensation for services rendered instead of all. Although the requirement in this provision is that the compensation shall be applied to "the payment of the bonds," and in the former "to pay the bonds and interest," yet it cannot be supposed Congress intended to relinquish the right secured in the former act to make the application in the first place to the interest and then to the principal. The purpose of Congress could have been nothing more than to surrender on behalf of the Government the right to retain the whole of the company's earnings and to accept in lieu of it the right to retain the half, leaving unaffected by this change any right touching this subject secured in the former act. The change was a very material one, and intended, doubtless, as a substantial favor to the companies.

Can you grant a substantial privilege to anyloody and take it back

Can you grant a substantial privilege to anybody and take it back again in the same terms? How much substantial favor could be conceded by this legislation to these companies if in the very same act you reserved the power to retake into your own hands that substantial favor ? But, says the Supreme Court :

But on the principle contended for it would prove, instead of this, to be of no value. Of what possible advantage could it be to these companies to receive payment for one-half their earnings, if they were subject to a suit to recover it back as soon as it was paid? And this is the effect of the provision on the theory that the companies are debtors to the Government on every semi-annual payment of interest. They could not, in the nature of things, have accepted the stipulation with an understanding that any such effect would be given it. If the Government consents to the diminution of its security, so that only half of the prices due for services are to be applied to the payment of the interest or principal, what is to become of the other half? Surely there is no implication that the Government shall retain it, and, if not, who is to get it? Manifestly the companies who have earned the money.

I ask again, what possible benefit could it be to the railroad companies that the Government should in one act make its lien for credit panies that the Government should in one act make its hen for credit loaned a secondary one and in the same act reserve by implication the right to make its lien take priority?

Having detained the Senate now, Mr. President, with the authorities in this matter by references to the reports of a committee of this body and to the decisions of the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court, I will say a few words in regard to the provisions of the bill that has been offered by the Judiciary Committee, and offer incidentally, also, a few remarks in connection with the bill that has been presented by the Committee on Railroads.

In his remarks this morning the Senator from Ohio was somewhat

In his remarks this morning the Senator from Ohio was somewhat In his remarks this morning the Senator from Ohio was somewhat facetious, or disposed to be, over the ingenious method that the Committee on Railroads had discovered to pay old debts, using the phrase so well known in comedy, "a new way to pay old debts;" but it was evident that it is impossible for him to dismiss from his mind the idea that has been stamped out of existence by the Supreme Court, that these companies owe anything to the Government of the United States these companies owe anything to the Government of the United States until the maturity of the bonds. When you propose to liquidate a debt that is not due until 1898, and you begin to pay on account of that debt to-day, whoever does pay on account of such a debt is entitled to the accumulating advantages of that payment. If I owe the Senator from Ohio $10,000 due in 1898 and he cannot call upon me for either principal or interest until its maturity, and I consent to pay and he consents to receive some payment on account during the current years pending its maturity, I am entitled to the advantages of the interest on those payments and he concedes it when he accents it from me pending its maturity, I am entitled to the advantages of the interest on those payments and he concedes it when he accepts it from me. He may be sound on his law, but the Supreme Court has decided for him and for us; but he is scarcely sound in his finance.

We have a debt sufficiently onerous in all conscience hanging over this country, some $2,000,000,000. The annual interest upon that debt is $100,000,000; and yet the scheme of the Finance Committee of this body, enacted into a law by Congress, that we can liquidate that debt by an annual sinking fund of 1 per cent. for thirty years and a total payment of $500,000,000 in that term, is conclusive. So if you can liquidate a debt of $2,000,000,000 in thirty years by daying 1 per cent. annually when the debt is not due until a certain maturity of the obligation can you not liquidate another debt by a deposit in of the obligation, can you not liquidate another debt by a deposit in the Treasury of the United States of 1 per cent. annually, the inter-the Treasury of the United States of I per cent. annually, the interest in both cases compounding upon the amount so deposited?

As I here take up the report of the Committee on Railroads and refer to it, I remark that the reason the committee has not pretended to provide for the administration of the affairs of the other companies named in the original Pacific Railroad acts, is because all those companies, except the two named, are in difficulties and cannot pay the interest on their first-mortgage bonds. Here is a proposition to-day from the Judiciary Committee to compel the companies to pay 25 per cent. of their net earnings into the Treasury of the United States when those companies are not competent from their accruing revenues even to pay the interest on their first-mortgage bonds. So we deal with but two companies. There will be due from the two companies, the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroads, principal and interest, in the year 1898, or about that average, at the maturity of the bonds, the sum of $157,268,137. It is proposed by the bill reported by the Committee on Railroads that there shall be annually deposited in the Treasury of the United States prior to and up to the maturity of that debt, 1 per cent. of the amount which, with accruing interest, will, at a certain period of time, liquidate both principal and interest disbursed by the Government of the United States.

You will observe, Mr. President, that in no event by the bill of the Judiciary Committee can more than 25 per cent. of the net earnings of these two companies be required to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. Now, from all the data we have before us, that is just what the other bill provides. The Senator from Ohio and other Senators, and the Judiciary Committee and the Committee of the House in the report laid upon our tables, have seen proper always to consider the net earnings of the entire road incorporated under one title as the earnings of the roads that were aided by the Government of the United States. So far as our information extends, the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California was aided by the Government only to the extent of two-thirds of its length, and the one-third of the road that was not aided by the Government is asserted to be the most profitable portion of it. But the Committee on Railroads have looked into the earnings of these companies, and on pages 4 and 5 of their report you will find them compiled with this result: The average annual net earnings of the Union Pacific Railroad, independent of some casual dividends that they have made one year or some other year, are $2,918,000. The average annual earnings of that portion of the Central Pacific Railroad of California that was aided by the Government are $2,894,693. Now 25 per cent. of either of these amounts is less than the amount that the Railroad Committee propose that they shall pay into the Treasury of the United States. Therefore I said at the outset that the same design was undertaken by both committees, to pay into the Treasury of the United States an amount that would liquidate their debt. The Committee on the Judiciary say 25 per cent. We do not say any particular per cent., because there is no telling whether the earnings of these railroads will increase or diminish, but we do say a specified sum, and we show by a reference to the reports of these companies that that specified sum is 25 per cent. of their pr what more? After there has been pant in $1,000,000 by each company many immediately and the $750,000 annually in semi-annual payments, there will have accumulated to the credit of those companies, at the maturity of the bonds, the sum of $58,000,000. That amount will be in the Treasury any way without dispute. A former Secretary of the Treasury, in submitting this matter to Congress in Executive Document No. 25, of last session, takes occasion to express his opinion that it is well to make some arrangement for a specific payment by the companies annually "with their consent." Why should he use that language? Why should he, as the highest financial officer of the Government, a man renowned for his crudite learning as a lawyer, take occasion to say to Congress that it would be well to make an arrangement with the consent of the companies? Because he saw, as others who studied this subject, that in the contingency of adverse decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in no possible event could the Government recover the amount that it has loaned these companies. The bill of the Judiciary Committee invites that issue; necessarily these companies must contest it; because if they once concede that you can encroach upon their receipts and divert them to any purpose, the Government can determine what it pleases. If you take 25 per cent. you can take 50; if you can take 50 you can take all; and I ask any Senator what is your recourse if you put such a matter on the hazard of a die? If you submit that to the decision of the Supreme Court with the intimation that its decision and language have already given you, what assurance have you that you can ever recover one dollar from those companies? Mr. President, I do not mean to say that they will be dishonest; but they will be independent of us if we should be met by an adverse decision of the Supreme Court. Their stock is upon the market in Wall street. The moment such a decision is rendered, it will be taken up eagerly, and it will go into the hands of speculators

The Senator from Ohio made a comparison between one of the provisions of the bill that he was supporting and the action to be had under it with the course pursued by a chancellor in marshaling the assets of an estate: that they should be so marshaled and distributed as interest might appear on the part of the several creditors of the estate. But did he ever hear of a case where the chancellor himself was a sovereign? Did he ever hear of a case where the chancellor himself was the largest creditor of that estate? Did he ever hear of a case where the assets, once marshaled, were marshaled into the strong-box of that chancellor himself, to be held and distributed as he might in his wisdom, independent of law, determine; for no law can control the Congress of the United States, except the law of its own action under the Constitution. Look at the provision of this bill in sections 7 and 8. I will read from section 8:

That said sinking fund so established and accumulated shall, according to the interest and proportion of said companies respectively therein, be held for the protection, security, and benefit of the lawful and just holders of any mortgage or lien debts of such companies, respectively, lawfully paramount to the rights of the United States.

United States.

This bill is advocated upon the pretext that it protects the interests of the first-mortgage bondholders, whereas the Railroad Committee's bill proposes to protect the interests of the Government, but it says that the money accumulating in this sinking fund shall be put into the Treasury of the United States subject to such liens and claims as shall be declared lawfully paramount to those of the United States; and the Senator who advocates that proposition in the same address states that he believes that, when that money shall have accumulated there, there will be a further charge against it of the interest upon the interest that has been paid out by the United States, so that this money accumulating in the Treasury of the United States is to be held by that sovereign power until it shall determine who is rightfully entitled to it; until it shall at its pleasure act and direct its distribution. Is there any appeal here for the holders of first-mortgage bonds for such an action as that? Do you suppose that they will consider that their interests are subserved by locking up in the Treasury of the United States the money that belongs to them, subject to such legislation as Congress in its sovereign power may subsequently enact?

Mr. Justice Grier, in the decision I have before referred to, says:

In the mere exercise of a corporate right the Government of the United States cannot claim the prerogative or immunities of a sovereign. She cannot compel a mortgagee to the hopeless remedy of a petition to Congress to redeem.

After you have marshaled these assets into the Treasury of the United States, how are they to be gotten out of the Treasury of the United States? In compliance with the law? By suit at law? No, sir; but those bondholders will be compelled to meet a Congress twenty years from now that will put its own construction upon the proper use and legally rightful disposition of that money. You do by this very act do that very thing that Justice Grier says you cannot do; you compel the mortgagees to the hopeless remedy of a petition to Congress for re-imbursement.

After the Judiciary Committee, of which the honorable Senator from Ohio is such a distinguished member, has recommended to and obtained the passage of an act by Congress requiring that the question of the 5 per cent. upon the net earnings shall be submitted to the adjudication of the court, he proposes now to make that definition by law outside of the court. He says:

It would be no objection to me to the first section of this bill if the Supreme Court were to decide to-day that the company's interpretation of "net earnings" is the true interpretation.

In other words, if the Supreme Court decided that the first section of the bill was wrong, in his opinion there would be no objection to it. I scarcely think that proposition can be sustained. There is a reference in some part of the Senator's remarks as to the cost of this road. I quote from the Senator from Ohio:

The companies went on and built these roads, and now I affirm that if anything is capable of proof, this is capable of proof and has been proved before one committee of the Senate, proved before two committees of the House of Representatives, that the Government subsidy in land and the proceeds of the Government bonds were all-sufficient to build every mile of these roads that was built; that in point of fact not one mile of these roads was built by the expenditure of the money of individual stockholders.

There is a fund of information in regard to the cost of these roads which is somewhat variant, and the Senator scarcely stated the whole of the presentation of the case. The cost of the Union Pacific as reported by that company in its last report to the Secretary of the Interior—the law requires that these companies shall make a report; it says an annual report of the cost of their road—the language is somewhat ambiguous and it is differently construed by the officer at the head of the Interior Department and by the companies, but at all events in one of the reports they made they say the road cost $112,506,252. Then a commission was appointed by the Secretary of the Interior who rendered a report in October, 1874, and they say that the road cost $115,214,757.79. An official commission appointed by the Secretary of the Interior on behalf of the Government of the United States report to him that that road cost $115,000,000, and the subsidy granted by the Government of the United States was in bonds $27,000,000.

The two statements disagree very widely. There is other testi-

The two statements disagree very widely. There is other testimony in regard to that. In report No. 78 of the House of Representatives, Forty-second Congress, third session, the Committee on the Credit Mobilier say that the road cost in round numbers $50,000,000. There is a committee of Congress reporting that the road cost $50,000,000, and the aid of the Government was only $27,000,000. Then in the Credit Mobilier testimony on pages 636 and 637 Benjamin F. Ham, assistant secretary and treasurer of the Credit Mobilier, states that the cost of the Union Pacific Railroad to the company, including the profits of the Credit Mobilier, which the committee found were about forty-three millions, amounted to $114,000,000, and the same gentleman gave the actual cost of the road at $71,000,000, nearly 200 per cent. advance upon the amount that the Government aided the company with. And yet we are told that the amount the companies got from the Government would be sufficient to build the whole road.

I scarcely think, Mr. President, that the Senator from Ohio did himself justice when he called the attention of the Senate to the sad calamity that might occur to the interests of this country when these railroad companies had succeeded in paying off their entire indebtedness to the Government. There is a provision in the bill recommended by the Committee on Railroads that when these companies have fully discharged all their obligations, pecuniary and otherwise, to the Government, then they shall be released from further requirement. What is that further requirement? The Senator says it is to maintain the road in good order and condition. We are left to infer thereby that the Committee on Railroads have made a provision that thereby that the Committee on Railroads have made a provision that just so soon as these companies have gotten out of debt and have re-imbursed to the Government of the United States every dollar that ever was advanced to them, then they intend to resign business and let their vast and valuable property go to wreck out of sheer negligence; and so it would be a great calamity to the Government of the United States if these companies should succeed in paying their indebtedness to the Government. Such an idea, I am sure, could never enter the brain of anybody. The Senator did not think so, I scarcely suppose when he said it

In the course of this discussion and the action which will be had by the Senate it will be requisite to discuss more in detail the provisions of the bill that has been recommended by the Committee on Railroads, and which will be offered as a substitute for the bill now unroads, and which will be offered as a substitute for the bill now under consideration. I shall take occasion to explain more at length its features and provisions; but I say in a summary way that it will yield to the Government of the United States by consent of the companies quite as much per annum as the bill that is recommended by the Judiciary Committee. The Senator from Ohio says that in no event shall more than 25 per cent. of the earnings of these companies be put into the Treasury of the United States for the creation of a sinking fund. Am I correct about that?

Mr. THURMAN Twanty-five per cent of the pet earnings. Yes

Mr. THURMAN. Twenty-five per cent. of the net earnings. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. WEST. He figures the net earnings from some untenable proposition. I contend that their net earnings will yield only $750,000. He thinks they will yield $1,500,000. So it is a question of figures; it is a question of amounts. Both committees desire the same thing, but the Senator figures the earnings of these companies upon a basis that I scarcely think we shall be able to maintain; and I again ask, suppose we do not, will any Senator tell me what recourse the Government of the United States will have against this property before the maturity of the bonds if the bill of the Senator from Ohio is submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States and an adverse decision is rendered thereon?

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot suppose such a thing. that is correct. Mr. WEST.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot suppose such a thing.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot suppose such a thing.

Mr. WEST. I very well remember, and I quoted to-day where Senators have stood upon this floor and said that they could not suppose the Supreme Court would ever be guilty of such an absurdity as to say that no interest or principal was due upon these bonds until their maturity. That absurdity has been nailed to the counter by the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Look over the debates on that question. Senators have risen in their places over and over again and said such a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States was out of the question; it was an absurdity. But we are met here to-day face to face by the was an absurdity. But we are met here to-day face to face by the naked positive fact that that decision has been rendered, and rendered unanimously by that court. Startling as it may seem we are brought face to face with the proposition that we have no recourse except to comply with the contract and agree to the letter of the Now, sir, shall we once more rush into that litigation that we have been recommended to over and over again by this very Judiciary Committee? Shall we once more lock horns again with Judiciary Committee? Shall we once more lock horns again with these powerful and potent companies and be defied once more by the decision of the Supreme Court? Shall we put all on that issue? No. Never mind, if the Senator's law is better than that of the Supreme Court the Supreme Court's law is more potent than his. Put it all on that issue and where are your $150,000,000? Gone, gone like smoke before the breeze; and that is the thing that the Committee on Railroads desire to guard against. They have followed, and this Senate has followed the lead of the Judiciary Committee over and over again. On this railroad question we have been led and this Senate has followed the lead of the Judiciary Committee over and over again. On this railroad question we have been led over and over again to defeat. Now shall we stake all once more upon their adjudication? I say not.

Mr. THURMAN. Did I understand the Senator to say that the Senate has been led by the Judiciary Committee over and over again? Do I correctly apprehend the Senator? I should like to have again? Do Portected apprehend the Schator? I should like to have an instance, just one instance.

Mr. WEST. The interest.

Mr. THURMAN. The interest! Why, the Judiciary Committee made a report which received the approbation of the Court of Claims and then of all the judges of the Supreme Court. I should like to know, then, how the Judiciary Committee has led the Senate into by legislation to submit that question to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court decided against us.

Mr. THURMAN. Is it any fault of the Judiciary Committee that they submitted that question to the supreme judicial tribunal of the ountry?

Mr. WEST. No, but it will be their fault if it goes there this time again and we get another adverse decision.

So, Mr. President, it is a question, as the Senator said at the outset of his remarks a few days ago, whether Congress shall wisely and judiciously legislate for the preservation of one hundred millions of property; it is a question whether we shall in good faith make an agreement with these companies that will attain the same result, or whether we shall undertake to compel them to do so, and therefore force them into an attitude of resistance that must necessarily follow the provisions of such a bill. In defense of their own rights, for self-preservation absolutely, as soon as the signature of the President of the United States is dry upon such legislation, they must arm themselves for the contest. Years will pass by; money will be kept out of the Treasury that is now ready to be paid into it, subject to a decision that we cannot afford to risk when we have an alternative that

Mr. President, I know, notwithstanding the great weight and importance of this subject, how dry and uninteresting it is, and in closing I only repeat the admonition that was made by the Senator from Ohio in his opening remark, that if we cannot frame a bill on this subject without grave consideration, certainly we ought not to pass any bill without an equal gravity of consideration. Senators scarcely seem, and have not throughout this debate, to attach the proper importance and interest to it; but we are playing to-day in this bill for a stake of $100,000,000 on behalf of the Government of the United States, and of $100,000,000 on behalf of the Government of the United States, and we must be careful that we do not, by inconsiderate and injudicious legislation, jeopardize its safety.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, it is not my intention to dwell at length on the merits of the bills pending before the Senate. I wish principally to call the attention of the Senate to the great difference which exists between the acts of 1862 and 1864. By the act of the 1st of July, 1862, a subsidy was voted in lands and bonds to a certain company to build a railroad from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean. The amount of bonds provided for in that law was $16,000 a mile. These bonds were secured on the road and all its appurtenances by a first mortgage. By the act of 1864 this first mortgage was converted into a second mortgage. The amount of bond subsidy remained the same for the extent of country lying east of the base of the Rocky Mountains and from the west base of the same base of the Rocky Mountains and from the west base of the same mountains to the Pacific Ocean, increasing the subsidy across the mountains for a distance of three hundred miles (by the law not to exceed three hundred miles) from $16,000 to $48,000 a mile and authorexceed three hundred miles) from $16,000 to $48,000 a mile and authorizing the company to put upon the road and secure by a first mortgage an equal amount of bonds. By the first law the amount of bonds which would have been furnished by the United States for building the road from the waters of the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean would have been about $32,000,000. That is, $16,000 a mile, the distance being about two thousand miles, would be just $32,000,000; yet the amount of bonds which has been issued for the building of this road and branches is just double this amount. It is $64,000,000. In my estimation the speculation, or, if you please, peculation, made by the corporators or the owners of the corporation took place in this increased subsidy across the mountains. Taking the distance to be three hundred miles, it is a plain matter of figures that, at $48,000 a mile, the amount would be $14,400,000 of bonds for this distance. In addition to this an equal amount of first-mortgage bonds of the comaddition to this an equal amount of first-mortgage bonds of the company was authorized to be issued and to be secured on the road. It made, therefore, an amount of $96,000 a mile for building those three hundred miles of road. I do not know as a matter of perfect accuracy, but I think I am justified in saying that for this distance of three hundred miles of road. dred miles the road was built perhaps for not to exceed $48,000 a mile. The consequence was that the amount of $14,400,000 of United States bonds furnished as a subsidy for building this portion of the road was a clear profit to the persons who were the owners of this corporation.

We have heard much in modern times of what was called the Credit Mobilier. I never was able to find out where the Government lost anything by the so-called Credit Mobilier. I do not wish, however, to be understood as vindicating this famous or infamous Credit Motall on that issue and where are your $150,000,000? Gone, gone like smoke before the breeze; and that is the thing that the Comittee on Railroads desire to guard against. They have followed, and this Senate has followed the lead of the Judiciary Committee over and over again. On this railroad question we have been led over and over again to defeat. Now shall we stake all once more upon their adjudication? I say not.

Mr. THURMAN. Did I understand the Senator to say that the Senate has been led by the Judiciary Committee over and over and over again? Do I correctly apprehend the Senator? I should like to have in instance, just one instance.

Mr. WEST. The interest! Why, the Judiciary Committee hade a report which received the approbation of the Court of Claims and then of all the judges of the Supreme Court. I should like to made a report which received the approbation of the Court of Claims and then of all the judges of the Supreme Court. I should like to make the first law. Therefore, by the condition of the court of Claims and then of all the judges of the Supreme Court. I should like to make a report which received the approbation of the Court of Claims and then of all the judges of the Supreme Court. I should like to make the subsidy in lands to double the amount, but yet provided that only one-half of the receipts from transportation should be retained by the Government toward repaying the interest on the bonds in lieu of the whole, as provided in the first law. Therefore, by the court of 1864, which increased the subsidy in lands to double the amount; and, in addition to this, for the distance of three hundred miles the subsidy in bonds was increased from $16,000 to $48,000 a mile, and secured only by a second mortgage. The owners of the road beyond all reasonable doubt realized as a clear profit for those three hundred miles all the bonds paid by the Government of the United States, being $14,400,000, and here was the peculation, here was the loss to the Government. It grew out of the act of 1864, not by any subsequent transactions, because the subsequent doings, no matter what they might have been, bad and corrupt as they were, did not increase the subsidy furnished by the Government in any way, shape, or form. That remained the same. It was on that portion of the road crossing the mountains for a distance of about three hundred miles that the Government lost by way of subsidy some $14,400,000.

I look upon the building of the road from the waters of the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, at the time particularly in which it was built, during the war, as perhaps the greatest achievement of the human race on the face of the earth. I am old enough to remember when the scheme of a railroad from the waters of the Missouri to the Pacific Ocean was looked upon as a wild dream, as a thing nearly imposized as a clear profit for those three hundred miles all the bonds paid when the scheme of a railroad from the waters of the Missouri to the Pacific Ocean was looked upon as a wild dream, as a thing nearly impossible if not entirely impossible of accomplishment. Yet it was accomplished, and in truth and in fact it was accomplished at comparatively small cost to the Government. The lands donated to the road were not worth a cent without the railroad. The Government had an empire lying west between the waters of the Missouri and the Pacific Ocean; an empire which has sprung into great States and Territories from that day; a country which has become of great advantage and which would have been utterly valueless without the railroad. It has also bound to this portion of the confederacy the Pacific coast with bands of iron, and no one can tell what might have been the destiny of that section during the war if it had not been for this railroad.

while all these things are true, and no one is disposed more than myself to legislate in the most liberal manner to protect those roads, and not to cripple them, at the same time I can very well see that with these large subsidies, not so much in lands, because they were of no value—of very little even at this day—but with the large subsidies in bonds, there has been an immense amount of money made by the companies. I give to the men who originated and carried through this great enterprise all possible credit for doing a great thing at a very critical moment in a very short space of time; nevertheless I can very well see that the amount of money which they have realized under the legislation of Congress has been enormous. On the portion of the road from the east base of the Rocky Mountains to the west base of the same mountains, the Government having only a second mort of the same mountains, the Government having only a second mortgage and the company having a first mortgage of $45,000 a mile, I hold that the Government has at this day no security at all of any value. The second mortgage on that portion of the road is not worth value. The second mortgage on that portion of the road is not worth a cent, because the first mortgage is too large. Hence, I am in favor, if we can do it constitutionally and legally, of the passage of any bill which will compel these parties to do substantial justice. I believe the bill proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary to be a constitutional bill. I believe that these persons can very well afford to comply with this bill with the large profits which they are now making; I speak of net profits because there are no other profits than net profits. They are able to pay 25 per cent. of those net profits into a sinking fund without serious injury. I see no objection constitutionally against their being compelled to do so. Hence I will support the bill offered by the Committee on the Judiciary, because I think it reasonable and because I believe it does not in any way cripple those companies. I because I believe it does not in any way cripple those companies. I would vote for no measure tending to cripple them, because I believe that it is of the greatest public importance that a connection should would vote for no measure tending to crippie them, because I believe that it is of the greatest public importance that a connection should be kept up between the waters of the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean. I look upon this road as of great public importance; but, while I believe it of public importance and would do nothing to cripple or to weaken the companies in any way, yet I can see no reason why they should not be compelled to pay an amount of money equal to 25 per cent. of their net profits, provided, as is provided in the bill, that this does not deprive them of the ability to pay the interest upon their first-mortgage bonds.

The Senator from Louisiana argued at great length that by taking 25 per cent. from them you thereby prevented them from paying the interest on their first-mortgage bonds. The bill is plain on this subject. If by taking 25 per cent. the profits are not sufficient to pay the interest on the first-mortgage bonds, then a deduction is to be made from the 25 per cent. In other words, the interest on the first-mortgage bonds must be paid first; not that the interest should be deducted from the amount of the net profits, but making a calculation of net profits, say they amount to $2,000,000, shall pay that amount and the balance goes into the Treasury and then on condition that this shall not exceed $1,500,000 a year. We know from reports made that the profits of the Union Pacific Railroad last year were about $8,000,000,000 net, and the profits of the Central Pacific were about $8,000, $6,000,000 net, and the profits of the Central Pacific were about $8,000,-$6,000,000 net, and the profits of the Central Pacific were about $8,000,000 net, exclusive of course of the interest on their first-mortgage bonds. That being so, and no man can deny those facts, it is not unreasonable, and there is nothing wrong in requiring these men to pay an amount equal to 25 per cent. of their net profits, provided that this 25 per cent. does not in any case exceed $1,500,000 a year. At this time 25 per cent. of the net profits of both these roads exceeds that amount. When it is apparent that these men have realized on the bonds of the United States millions of dollars—and this is beyond all controversy—it is but just that something should be done to protect the Government for its large advance of bonds, carrying very near four millions a year of interest.

It was supposed at the time the act of 1864 was passed, and more so when the act of 1862 was passed, that a road from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean over the supposed insurmountable Rocky Mountains was a work of great engineering difficulty if not impossible. These mountains were known in our geographies as the Rocky Mountains, full of deep cuts and immense and steep elevations with deep valleys to be spanned, when in point of fact for hundreds of miles from the Missouri River to the base of the Rocky Mountains the country is as level nearly as any portion of Illinois. The ascent is so gentle that you do not perceive it when traveling in the cars. In the Rocky Mountains themselves, although in some portions the ascent is steep, the work was not expensive, not as expensive as making a road from the city of Baltimore to the Ohio River. Hence when these road from the city of Baltimore to the Ohio River. Hence when these persons were authorized to place a mortgage of $48,000 a mile on that portion of the road across the mountains, they were enabled to build that road with this $48,000, and the $45,000 of Government subsidy was a clear profit to them under the provisions of that law of 1864. There can be no doubt about that. Therefore, sir, I think it but justice to the Government to protect itself and take care of itself and to reto the Government to protect itself and take care of itself and to require that these persons shall pay a proportion of their great profits, provided they are thereby not crippled in such a way as not to be able to pay the interest on their first-mortgage bonds. The object of this bill is to accumulate a fund for a wise purpose; not for the profit of the Government, but to accumulate a fund, bearing regular interest, subject to the payment of the obligations of the corporation on the maturity of the bonds, not only the obligations due to the Government but their first-mortgage bonds. If they are unable to pay their first-mortgage bonds, these assets accumulated in the sinking fund are to be marshaled, to use a law phrase so as to be divided no rate between be marshaled, to use a law phrase, so as to be divided pro rata between the debt due to the first-mortgage bondholders as well as the debt due to the Government for the bonds voted to the road by way of subsidy.

There can be nothing fairer. The only question—and that question I do not pretend to be able to decide—is one of legal ability.

The Senator from Oregon argued the other day, and I admit argued with ability, the constitutional point, the right of this Government to impair what he calls the obligation of a contract. If the case came within that he was a substantial that he was a substantial that he calls the obligation of a contract. within that boundary called a contract, that you could not impair of course, and his argument would be conclusive; but I think my friend from Ohio explained that perfectly well. Under the power retained to amend and to alter you cannot divest the individuals who may claim property under the corporation or the stockholders who have interests in the stock; you cannot divest them of any vested right; yet you can control to a certain extent the assets of the company so as to protect the Government for the bonds advanced under I believe this to be constitutional, and I am very certain it is perfectly just. You cannot confiscate those assets; you cannot say "We shall take those and put them in the Treasury for our benefit." That would be impairing the obligation of the contract, and would be spoliation. But in view of the fact that a large and enormous grant was voted to these roads, in view of the known fact that these men realized millions of profit under the act of 1864, I can see no objection to compelling them to accumulate a fund, it being theirs all the time, not belonging to the Government—it is their own and kept for their purposes, to pay their debts, and when these debts are fully paid, if there be a remainder left in the sinking fund, it will belong to them—I can see no objection to that. I do not regard it as impairing the obligation of the contract. After having heard all the arguing the obligation of the contract. After having heard all the arguments, nevertheless I cannot see any constitutional objection to the bill proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary.

I had an object in speaking to-day. It was to draw the attention of the Senate and of the public to the fact which, it seems to me, has always been overlooked, that the speculation in the Pacific Railroad really had its origin in the act of 1864, and was confined pretty much to the three bundered miles over the mountains. to the three hundred miles across the mountains. Here was the great profit of that enterprise. I believe that the amount of bonds author-ized to be issued by the company, and which were made a first mort-gage by law, was ample to build the three hundred miles of road over gage by law, was ample to build the three hundred miles of road over the mountains. Hence the amount of bonds voted to the company by way of subsidy was a clear profit to them. By the act of 1862 they were entitled to receive $16,000 a mile on the completion of forty miles of the road, and by the act of 1864 it was on the completion of twenty miles of the road; and the evidence of completion was to be a report made by commissioners appointed by the Government. These commissioners were not required to state the cost of the road; they were only required to state the simple fact that twenty miles of the road, from such a place to such a place, were finished; and although it might have been true, as was often the case, that the road had not cost more than the amount of bonds authorized to be issued by the corporation and secured by a first mortgage, nevertheless upon that cost more than the amount of bonds authorized to be issued by the corporation and secured by a first mortgage, nevertheless upon that certificate being received by the Secretary of the Interior they were entitled to receive $16,000 per mile for that portion of the country lying on this side of the mountains and for the portion lying on the other side of the mountains, and $48,000 a mile for that portion over the Rocky Mountains, regardless of the cost of the road. If the law had been that they could only receive an amount of money equal to the amount expended for building the road, many millions of dollars could have been saved; but that was not the law; they were to get could have been saved; but that was not the law; they were to get an amount of money regardless of the cost of the road, which amount over the mountains was entirely too large when you consider that they were authorized themselves to issue first-mortgage bonds.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that the bill reported by the Com-There may be mittee on the Judiciary will be passed by the Senate. There may be some doubt about it. The Senator from Louisiana this morning said with some force, and the Senator from Oregon has suggested that it may lead to a lawsuit, this company may resist this thing; but I think it is better that the effort should be made and let the Supreme Court pass upon the question again. So it is that something has got to be done, if it be possible, to secure the Government against this immense indebtedness, which is augmenting every day from the fact that these corporations do not pay their interest. We know that one-half the Government transportation is too small to meet the amount of interest which has to be paid on the Government bonds semi-annually by the Government. It must not be overlooked also that they have entirely failed to pay the 5 per cent. on their net profits. It is a question between the Government and these large corporations; and I am not willing to yield to them without at least making an effort to protect the public interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday proposed an amendment. with some force, and the Senator from Oregon has suggested that it

Mr. SHERMAN. I drew that amendment hastily, and I do not think it exactly carries out the purpose I had in view. Therefore I shall withdraw it in its present form. Perhaps the language of the committee in section 4 of the bill carries out the general object that I also wish to advance.

Perhaps I might as well now, briefly, for it will take but a few moments, state my own view in regard to this important bill. I look upon it more in the financial aspect of it, as an effort to relieve the Government of the United States without crippling these railroads. rather than undertake a discussion of the legal principle involved as rather than undertake a discussion of the legal principle involved as to the right of Congress to change and alter the laws creating these corporations. I shall only refer to the money aspect of the bill.

If I understand my colleague, this bill intends to require all these railroad companies to pay one-half of the cost of the Government transportation into the Treasury of the United States and also 5 per cent. of the net earnings of these roads into the Treasury of the United States to aid it in carrying on the ordinary operations of the Government, to aid it also in meeting the interest on these railroad bonds, so that so far as this bill is concerned it makes no burden whatever muon the railroads that is not admitted by them to be imwhatever upon the railroads that is not admitted by them to be imposed by the laws of their creation.

I have thought, although my opinion is worth nothing against the opinion of the Supreme Court, that the Supreme Court put an erroneous construction upon this law. But they have decided that the railroad companies are not bound to refund to the Government of the railroad companies are not bound to refund to the Government of the United States the money advanced by the United States as interest on its bonds until the expiration of thirty years. That was not my understanding of the law when it was passed, and I think the debate shows that clearly enough. But there is no doubt whatever that by the law as it stands the railroad company are compelled to apply and pay to the Government one-half of the cost of Government transpor-That is admitted on all hands. It is also admitted on all hands that these companies are bound to pay 5 per cent. of the net earnings, which they never have yet done. I ask my friend if I am not correct about that; if these railroad companies have ever paid to the Government of the United States one single cent from the net earnings of their roads, either of them?

Mr. WEST. I do not know that they have; but the Government has retained the whole of the transportation as an offset against their 5 per cent., subject to the adjudication of the courts. There is now an accumulation to the credit of each of these two larger companies of the sum of $1,000,000 subject to that issue.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand it. The railroad compenies have never, to the extent of one dollar, paid to the United States what it is clearly and palpably their duty to pay by the terms of both laws; that is, 5 per cent. of the net earnings.

Mr. WEST. The Senator ought to take off the unfavorable edge of that proposition by admitting that the Government has retained the amount, and therefore there was no necessity for the companies to amount, and therefore there was no necessity for the companies to pay it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to that. I again repeat, and it is a fact that I want to make prominent, that although it is the clear mandate of the law as plainly written as the authority which incorporated these companies, they never have paid to the Government of the United States one dollar of the 5 per cent. fund which they are required to pay on the net earnings of their roads; and if they were dealing with any other creditor but the United States of America they would have found that a pretty serious allegation. While the Government of the United States is paying $3,600,000 a year for the benefit of these corporations, now growing wealthy, they never have complied in the slightest degree with any stipulation made in favor of the Government of the United States.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask the Senator whether in the mean time league, that the Judiciary Committee bill, if it become a law, will leave sufficient means to these two great companies to pay from 3 to 4 per cent. dividends on the market value of their stock at a time when not twenty railroads in the whole United States pay any dividends at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I will go on. I want to get the simple ele-

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I will go on. I want to get the simple elements of this case first.

Mr. PADDOCK. May I be allowed one word?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is due to these companies to say that there has been a question as to the date upon which these roads were considered legally to have been completed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was coming to that.

Mr. PADDOCK. And there has been a controversy between the Government and the roads in respect to that question, and because of the pendency of that controversy and because there has not been an arrival at a conclusion satisfactory on both sides in reference to an arrival at a conclusion satisfactory on both sides in reference to that date, the question of the 5 per cent. has not been settled.

Mr. SHERMAN. I intended to come to that, because I mean to show the mode in which these railroad companies have looked on their obligations to the Government of the United States. The Supreme Court have declared, and the law is plain without the declaration of any court, that these railroads were bound to apply one-half of the receipts for Government work to the payment of this interest. It is also clear that they were bound to pay 5 per cent. on their net earnings from the completion of the roads; and here come the claims earnings from the completion of the roads; and here come the claims made by the companies. I want to present them as they appear to me. This is the only obligation imposed by the law, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, upon these railroads, and not one of them has complied with it in the slightest degree except as they have been compelled in the mode I will mention. That is rather remarkable. We have already given them bonds to the amount of $64,000,000, and we have paid in money from the Treasury of the United States some eight or ten years' interest, how much precisely I do not know. Does my colleague remember the amount of interest? do not know. Does my colleague remember the amount of interest?

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question right there.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to be drawn into an argument;

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to be drawn into an argument; but I will yield.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose it is all true as stated by the Senator from Ohio that these railroad companies have not paid any part of the 5 per cent. on their net earnings since the completion of the roads, I do not pretend to question the statement now; but the reason, I suppose, is as stated by the Senator from Nebraska, that there has been a controversy as to the time when the roads were completed, and that controversy is now pending in the courts. But suppose it is all true does that after the power or change the power of Congress. is all true, does that alter the power or change the power of Congress in reference to this matter one way or the other?

Mr. SHERMAN. I must argue one question at a time. First I want to know whether it is true, and then I will talk about the materiality of it. I have here the simple statement, and I want again to impress it on the Senate, to show that they are dealing with a question of vast magnitude; that not only have we issued bonds to the sum of $64,000,000 to these railroads, but that the Government of the United States has paid besides, as interest on these bonds, at the time the document before me was made up, a year or two ago, $30,141,513, money collected in the form of taxes from the people of the United

Mr. BOUTWELL. A portion of it must have been re-imbursed, I

Mr. SHERMAN. Some of it by the application of one-half of the Government transportation, and I intended to allude to that. But we have paid out of the Treasury of the United States, according to this document, which is a year old—it is Judge Lawrences's report made April 25, 1876, $30,141,513. The railroad companies have paid to the Government of the United States not one dollar; but in pursuance of law the Government has retained one-half the cost of transporting Government supplies over their roads, the amount of which precisely I do not know.

transporting Government supplies over their roads, the amount of which precisely I do not know.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if it is not true that the Government has practically retained all?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to that, but my friend would hurry me. I want to know now how much has been the whole amount of the share of transportation the Government has retained. I am not so familiar with these books as I ought to be, but at any rate I should like to give credit for the precise amount.

Mr. PADDOCK. I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Ohio, but I think if we make these figures correct as we go along, we shall have a better knowledge of the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. The public debt shows it. These railroads have never paid one dollar, but have done service for the United States to the amount of $6,851,349.77; so that the Government of the United to the amount of $6,851,349.77; so that the Government of the United States, besides issuing its bonds to these railroads, has paid in money over and above all services rendered by these railroads nearly twentyfour million dollars in cash.

Mr. WEST. Are those figures on the debt statement?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; on the debt statement. I have it here.

So far as the application of one-half of service for the Government Mr. THURMAN. Six per cent. dividends on the stock.
Mr. SHERMAN. I did not know that.
Mr. THURMAN. And I will say now, if I do not interrupt my colernment has paid in interest, actual outlay, thirty-odd million dollars. Besides that, there is a stipulation in the law which has been read by both the Senators that the Government of the United States is to receive from the completion of the road 5 per cent. of the net earnings. Here there were two elements. When was this road completed? Never, and it never will be—

Mr. PADDOCK. I think it is hardly fair to make that statement. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, but I am interrupted just in the midst of a sentence.

Mr. PADDOCK. I beg pardon.
Mr. SHERMAN. I said never, and never will be according to the Mr. SHERMAN. I said never, and never will be according to the construction which may be given as to any railroad. No railroad is ever completed in one sense; but a railroad is completed in the ordinary plain sense of common men when its track is completed through and it connects and runs as a completed line between the terminal points; and that is the plain meaning of the law. Therefore, the very moment this road as a continuous line commenced earning money and had net earnings, that moment it was completed, and by honor as well as by the plain language of the law the companies were bound to pay that 5 per cent, small though it might be; yet they never have done it. They said the road was not completed. When was the road completed It has been decided.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am not able to give the Senator the information exactly; but this is true, that the Government appointed a commission of eminent citizens who went and examined the road to ascertain if it was completed, and they reported that it was not, and upon that report it was required of the Union Pacific Company alone that it should expend some million and a half of dollars, which it did thereafter, and the Central Pacific as I remember a corresponding amount.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand all that.

Mr. PADDOCK. So that if there were any proceeds before that time it was necessary undoubtedly that they should go to help up the million and a half of dollars which was required to complete the road when that report was made; and thereupon the sum required was exwhen that report was made; and thereupon the sum required was expended and the road was put in that condition which afterward was determined by a commission to be a completed road. Then, as I understand, the company was ready from that date, from that report, to pay 5 per cent.; and that is the controversy between the Government and the company.

Mr. SHERMAN. When was that date?

Mr. PADDOCK. I am not able to tell you the date exactly. There was probably a year and a half's difference.

Mr. WEST. As the Senator from Ohio wishes to know something definite—— definite

Mr. SHERMAN. I just want to know the date.
Mr. WEST. I will then give it from an official document, from the report of a commission on behalf of the United States appointed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SHERMAN. Just give me the date.

Mr. WEST. I will give it to you. Here are the words:

This commission has therefore decided that the road was completed as required by law by the report of the former commission and to comply with the instructions of the Interior Department, October 1, 1874, at a total cost of $115,214,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the date?

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the date?

Mr. WEST. October 1, 1874.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. Now I have got it. The construction which the railroad companies put on this is, that as long as they could put off complying with their part of the contract the road was not done; as long as there was a single bridge that was not built according to the language of the law or a single tie that was not laid sufficiently along the language of the law or a single tie that was not laid sufficiently along the law of the law or a single tie that was not laid sufficiently along the law of t ciently close to the next tie; as long as a single portion of any item of their work remained incomplete, the road was not done; and as a matter of course it was their interest to make that time as remote as possible. But the road was reported as completed in October, 1874 possible. But the road was reported as completed in October, 16/4; and yet we all know that people went over that road, that it had earnings five years before that; and yet upon that kind of construction they have postponed paying to the Government one single dollar of what are called "net earnings."

Mr. President, this shows that in dealing with these corporations we must make the language so plain and precise, and must make the duty of the officers so clear that there can be no doubt about the interpretation. There is just the condition in which we are placed.

But that is not all on the point of the completion of the road. Mr.

President, they completed the road by sections of twenty miles; when one section of twenty miles was completed and certified to by Government inspectors they drew their bonds, and when the last section was completed they drew their bonds upon a completed road because they were only entitled to draw bonds as the road was completed. When the road was completed and the last bonds were drawn, then not only the equity of the law but the plain meaning of the law required them to pay 5 per cent. of the net earnings. That is not all. What are net earnings? That is a somewhat indefinite term; but most people know what "net earnings" are. Most people know that when a man has an income of a thousand dollars a year and spends $999 he is happy, because he has one dollar to his credit over and above his expenses. If it is the other way, he is very unfortunate. These railroads soon made net earnings in one sense; but they claimed to deduct from their net earnings all the interest -not only on bonds that were prior in their right to the bonds on bonds of the United States but those subsequent to the bonds of the United States; in other words, if they manufactured and issued what are called water-bonds they deducted that and claimed that until the last interest on the last of these bonds should be paid there could be no net earnings. By that rule there are no net earnings in more than thirty or forty railroads of the United States, because the great body of the railroads in the United States have made no net earnings in that view; and yet according to their reports there are plenty of net earnings, a large mass of net earnings. Why? Because by the common language of plain railroad men net earnings mean that balance mon language of plain railroad men net earnings mean that balance which is left after taking from the gross earnings the cost of running the road; not the cost of constructing new bridges, not the cost of paying interest on debts, not the money that is paid to stockholders either in the form of interest or in the form of dividends, but the mere running expenses of the road. Therefore, if a road earns $8,000,000 and pays out $4,000,000 for the running expenses, the other $4,000,000 are net profits, although every dollar may go to the bondholders to pay the interest on the bonds. That is the plain meaning of "net earnings" of "net earnings."

Mr. WEST. I merely rise to ask the Senator whether there has ever been a judicial decision on the question as to what constitute net earnings of the road, and whether that very question in this case has not been remitted by act of Congress to the United States courts, has not been remitted by act of Congress to the United States courts, because we were all at loss about this sum?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me state frankly that in my judgment the men who own these railroads, now enormously valuable, ought to be prompt and eager to do their duty by the Government of the United States. They ought not to await the long delays of a lawsuit, or the interminable delays of a final judgment in the Supreme Court of the United States to tell them what "net earnings" mean. The intelligible gent gentlemen, among the ablest and best in our land, some of them the shrewdest men in our land, who are stockholders and managers of these roads know mighty well what "net earnings" are when they come to divide dividends and profits and collect interest. When they are dealing with a government which has been so liberal to them in the management and building up of a great property, they ought not to wait for a final decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to know what "net earnings" are, or to learn when their road was completed. The worst thing that has ever been said about these railroad companies is the fact that although the Government has been railroad companies is the fact that although the Government has been bounteous to them, not only in bonds but in money, they seem to hang on to the last leg and to the most harsh construction of the law against the very Government whose credit alone enabled them to build their roads. That is what I complain of. The court has already decided in their favor on one point; and although I think the court did not catch the meaning of the law, probably it was because we were faulty in passing the law; yet even the law as it stands has not been complied with in that spirit in which a generous government ought to have been dealt with, when it gave, I may say, large bounties, large aids to these railroad corporations. aids to these railroad corporations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, but I am prolonging my remarks longer than

I intended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to ask the Senator whether he consid-Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to ask the Senator whether he considers the delinquency of the companies, the failure to pay the 5 per cent. required by the law, any more to be condemned than the delinquency of the Government in the failure to pay the half compensation required by law?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Government not only was justified, but it was its bounden duty to hold on to this money to compel them to pay what was due. That is all there is of it. Here is my friend from Massachusetts who was the Secretary of the Treasury at the time—

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am responsible for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. He says he is responsible. He never denied that the United States owed these roads one-half the Government transportation account; but he turned around like any other debtor would and said "these people owe me twice as much under another plain provision of the law, and I will not pay what is due to them until they pay what is due to me."

Mr. WEST. What did the Supreme Court say to that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care what the Supreme Court say about that. I think that is simply plain honesty; and on that question'I think the Senator from Massachusetts was exactly right in dealing for the Government. Certainly I would have done it if I had been in his position. It must be remembered, therefore, that all that this bill reported from the Judiciary Committee, in rather vague language I his position. It must be remembered, therefore, that all that this bill reported from the Judiciary Committee, in rather vague language I admit—for I cannot yet get into my head the fourth section—does is to require that these railroads shall still pay to the Government of the United States one-half of the cost of transportation and also 5 per cent. of the net earnings; that is, all that goes to the benefit of the United States, every dollar under the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee. My friend from Louisiana shakes his head. Let me see what they are. This sinking fund is not for the benefit of the Government. This sinking fund pays the debt of the railroads: but there what they are. This sinking fund is not for the benefit of the Government. This sinking fund pays the debt of the railroads; but there is a kind of idea that what these companies are to pay a million and a half of dollars into the sinking fund, we are making them pay it to the United States! Not at all. That sinking fund is the property of the companies. It goes to pay their debts, to diminish their liabilities, but not one dollar of it goes to the Treasury of the United States. I say now that as in the law of 1862 and 1864 there was no provision made for a sinking fund, it is the plain and manifest duty of Congress to provide for a sinking fund not only to pay off gradually the bonds issued by the United States but also to pay off the first-mortgage bonds. Every State government that is well managed, all the Northern States have in their railroad laws provision for a sinkthe Northern States, have in their railroad laws provision for a sinking fund. I know in the laws of Ohio—I do not know how it is in regard to other States—there is some provision for the payment of the debts of a railroad company always inserted in the railroad law. There must be a sinking fund. Wherever a debt is made a provision of a suitable character ought to be made to pay the debt. That must be the case in New York and in Massachusetts. I think that in all the States whenever a railroad is chartered and bonds are authorized to be issued, there is a provision in the law for a sinking fund. Congress is the law-making power here. Whether the right to change or alter this law was reserved in the act or not, Congress as part of the law-making power might provide for a sinking fund as to either of these companies.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Senator if there is any imit to the extent of that power?

Mr. SHERMAN. No. Legislative power may be greatly abused, but the provision for a sinking fund is not a power likely to be abused. A sinking fund is merely to secure the payment of the debts of a cor-But there is no question about it here, because the right to alter, amend, or repeal clearly gives the power.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is it not true that there is no controversy between any of us in respect to the sinking fund; only as to the amount ween any or us in respect to the sinking fund; only as to the amount of it; one party maintaining and insisting that Congress should provide for it and another insisting that the provision should be only such a one as the company may deem proper?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very glad my friend has come to that, because that saves me the necessity of going further. It is admitted, therefore, that a provision for a sinking fund is a proper provision in a law. One is provided in either of these bills. The next question is how much. There are two elements only to consider. In the tion is how much. There are two elements only to consider. In the next place the sinking fund must be sufficient to secure the payment of debts when they mature. That is the first principle of a sinking fund. The next principle is that it must not affect the rights of creditors. Therefore it would not be right to provide a sinking fund for a second-mortgage creditor that would impair the vested rights of a first-mortgage creditor. If this bill affects the rights of a first-mort-gage creditor in providing a fund for the second-mortgage creditor, I would say it was in violation of a contract and ought not to be I would say it was in violation of a contract and ought not to be done. The Judiciary Committee seem to have had this general principle in view, because, after stating how much shall be provided for a sinking fund, they have stated that in no event shall this provision affect in any way the right of using sufficient money even out of the sinking fund to pay the interest on the first-mortgage bonds. Is not that the proposition?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; that is right. Then when you go beyond that the next lien is the lien of the Government. The lien of the stockholders and all the subordinate bondholders is nothing. The stockholders and all the subordinate bondholders is nothing. The lien of the Government is the next lien, is admitted to be on all hands. Now what is a reasonable sinking fund for the lien of the Government? It seems to me that if anything the committee have fallen short of what is requisite, because they have not required this sinking fund to be sufficient to pay the interest as it matured, so that there is plainly, notwithstanding the passage of this bill, an increasing debt due by these companies to the United States of America. The mode provided for of a million and a half does not pay all the interest that the Government is to pay. Consequently the debt of the Pacific Railroads to the Government is constantly increasing. Under the bill of roads to the Government is constantly increasing. Under the bill of the Judiciary Committee, as I take it, with the exception of two principal roads, the other roads are not able to pay. I suppose the Kan sas Pacific is not able to pay.

Mr. WEST. That is in the hands of a receiver.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is in the hands of a receiver; therefore it is not able to pay, and hence that provision as to it is practically nugatory. But take the two great corporations that pay. The provision for the sinking fund is of a less sum than the annual addition to the debt of the United States, the interest being, I believe, something like three millions two hundred and odd thousand dollars, and the sinking fund provided is only $3,000,000.

millions two hundred and odd thousand dollars, and the sinking fund provided is only $3,000,000.

Mr. WEST. Your sinking fund for the national debt is $20,000,000 and your interest is $100,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be, but there is a very great difference. Here this debt has got to be paid in thirty years. A large amount of interest has accumulated, so that, even if these two principals. cipal companies pay the full amount provided by this bill, their debt to the United States will be increasing year by year, so that it is not unreasonable, unless they are not able to pay. As to their ability to pay I know nothing except what I see in all these documents. I see that the net earnings of the Central Pacific are $8,031,498. My friend from Louisiana said that that was too much, or that there ought to be deductions from that. I did not understand him exactly.

Mr. WEST. In those estimates of the running of that road they include the total line of the road of the Central Pacific, twelve hundred and nineteen miles, whereas only eight hundred and sixty-six miles of that road have been aided by the Government of the United and the one-third that was not aided is, I am told, the most profitable part of the road. Therefore it is manifestly unjust to take the earnings of the whole road to make a calculation of earnings that are due to the Government.

mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?
Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.
Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator from Louisiana include in that the Western Pacific, which is a bonded and land-subsidy road?

Mr. WEST. O, no; the Western Pacific is in the twelve hundred and nineteen miles, but the Oregon and California Pacific is a very different thing, and there are lateral branches in all directions. In other words, the actual report of the proceeds and operations of the Central Pacific Railroad included four hundred and odd miles that are not aided by the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I take these figures from the reports. There has been probably some delay in making these reports. I have often heard the matter a subject of conversation. It was very difficult to find out the exact earnings of the Pacific Railroad. That has been a matter of talk among business men, but these are the figures they give. How much ought to be deducted I do not know, nor is it material to my argument. I would as lief take the figures of the Senator from Louisiana. If he would tell us how much the subsidized railroad earns I would take his figures and work out the problem. I take the earns I would take his figures and work out the problem. I take the figures I have given from their report of the net earnings of the Central Pacific. There is, first, the interest on first-mortgage bonds. That is$1,671,340. That is given precisely. The next is this sinking fund, because the railroads are practically released from paying the interest to the Government by the operation of this sinking fund. They do not have to pay anything to the Government at all. That is fixed by this bill at $1,500,000, so that the total amount to be paid on the first and second mortgage bonds, including the sinking fund, is $3,171,340, leaving $4,860,158 surplus to pay the interest on both classes of bonds, nearly $5,000,000 of profits to be divided to the stockholders who paid nothing $5,000,000 of profits to be divided to the stockholders who paid nothing for their stock or bonds that were issued, all subsidiary liens to the liens of the United States. It seems to me that if the committee have erred they have erred in not making the amount greater. It seems to me out of this surplus and net earnings they ought to acquire a pretty large sum as a sinking fund for the later bonds. If we were legislating for these railroads, to advance their interests, to place them higher in the market, to raise their stocks and bonds, we ought in addition to a sinking fund for the first-mortgage bonds to provide a sinking fund for the second-mortgage bonds, so that the debt may be gradually diminished, leaving the property of the stockholders advancing day by day and year by year. That is the course which is pursued in regard to other railroads. It is the course that ought to be pursued. It is to their interest to pursue it, and it is a mistake to leave to the future to settle all these vast sums of money which are increasing year by year. The earnings ought to be applied to the interest on the first-mortgage bonds, second, to the interest on the second-mortgage bonds, and third, to a sinking fund for both mortgages.

Mr. WEST. If the Senator will permit me, both companies have provided a sinking fund for the first-mortgage bonds, and it is accumulating now

Mr. SHERMAN. Where is it provided?

Mr. WEST. Provided by their own action, by the board of direct-

Mr. SHERMAN. That shows that what I have said is correct. The law is faulty in not requiring them to have a sinking fund. My friend says that the wise men who manage this branch are already doing what the law ought to have required them to do. Therefore, it would be no hardship for us to step in and say that they should have a sinking fund to diminish the first-mortgage bonds, so as to provide for the second-mortgage bonds and preserve the property of the stockholders when thirty years roll around. It seems to me a very plain proposition; and when you apply these same figures to the Union Pacific it is full of the same kind of meaning. It is admitted Union Pacific it is full of the same kind of meaning. It is admitted on all hands, I believe—I have heard no controversy about it—that the net earnings of the Union Pacific are $6,148,365. The first-mortgage interest is $1,634,190. The sinking fund provided in that case is a million and a half, making the amount of interest and sinking fund $3,134,190. This, deducted from the net earnings of the road, leaves a balance of net earnings of $3,014,175. In my judgment, it is for the interest of these corporations, for the interest of the stockholders as well as others, and it would be wise to take a million out of those $3,000,000 and apply it for the sinking fund for the first-mort. of those $3,000,000 and apply it for the sinking fund for the first-mort-gage bonds. My friend says that they have done something of that kind, but how much I do not know. There is no evidence about it that I know of; I have never seen it in the papers.

Mr. WEST. If I do not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask

Mr. WEST. If I do not interrupt the Schator, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. If he were the holder of a first mortgage on a railroad would he allow the creditors who owned the second mortgage to control independently of law the sinking fund of the first mortgage?

Mr. SHERMAN. We are not exactly in the light of creditors, the United States it is true is a creditor, but the United States is the United States and the Corporation of the law realistics.

United States of America, and the Congress is the law-making power, not only for the States and people of the United States, but for these orporations as well.

Mr. WEST. It never pays anything without an act of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. The railroad company will not pay without an act of Congress. There is the trouble, and we are trying to make a law. There is no difficulty about it. My friend from Louisiana says these railroad companies are already establishing sinking funds, and that shows the widow of the measurement of the property of them. that shows the wisdom of the managers of them. So with all these great corporations. They do it as a matter of course. I know of great railroads in this country now that are very profitable indeed, whose debts are gradually being eliminated by the operation of sinking funds wisely and carefully conducted; and soon these great corporations will be entirely free from debt and will be the property of their stockholders alone without bonds whatever, and that process with the Pacific Pailroad.

their stockholders alone without bonds whatever, and that process ought to go on with the Pacific Railroad.

I say, therefore, that this bill stops short, so far as the sinking fund is concerned, of what would really be for the interest of the stockholders of these roads. Not only should the sinking fund provided for be sufficient for the first, but for the second mortgage bonds. Then this railroad, growing gradually with the strength of the country, gradually increasing the stock, would be gradually advancing in value. I think, then, you might as well dismiss from this problem the idea that this million and a half goes to the United States. It does not do it at all. It is for the benefit of the road, and every dollar of it is applied to buy up the bonds of the road or to be invested does not do it at all. It is for the benefit of the road, and every dollar of it is applied to buy up the bonds of the road or to be invested in United States bonds as a sinking fund, and these United States bonds or Pacific Railroad bonds, whatever they are, are the property of the road in the form of a sinking fund to be used for their benefit. It does seem to me that section 4 of the bill is open to some criticism for ambiguity; I yet cannot get it through my head; but the general purpose of the bill is right, that is, that these railroads should now from this time forward commence paying the 5 per cent. on net earnings, and also give to the Government one-half of the transportation account, and do so in the form of taxes, and pay this interest, and then they should provide a sinking fund, I think, sufficient to pay the interest. I would rather increase it. I believe it would be better for the railroads, so that this debt would not be increasing, and I would be perfectly willing to vote for a proposition that would go a little further and gradually pay the first-mortgage bonds, and thus protect this property in the hands of the stockholders. The interest of the people of the United States and of all parts of it is largely concerned in the wise management and prudent care with which these great corthis property if the states and of all parts of it is largely concerned in the wise management and prudent care with which these great corporations are conducted; but it is not wise or prudent for them or for their stockholders to divide large sums of surplus earnings when they have enormous debts to pay. It is far better for them that a portion of this surplus should be applied to the gradual liquidation of those debts. As I believe this bill will do it, I shall vote for it for want of a better measure.

I do not care about criticising the other bill which has been introduced and is now presented, because, perhaps, my views are sufficiently shown by what I said on this bill. I regard this other bill, Senate bill No. 1134, as a practical surrender of the right of the United States under its second mortgage. The accumulations of a sinking fund of $1,000,000 for the benefit of the road is simply a surrender of the right $1,000,000 for the beneat of the road is simply a surrender of the right of the United States to the road. According to that bill I do not see any provision where the United States gets anything. If my friend will show any section here by which the Treasury of the United States gets any money out of the road, I should like to know where it is. As I understand the bill, all the money now agreed to be paid to the United States goes into the sinking fund for the benefit of the railroad company, and we might better at once end the matter by giving un our right.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I am compelled to go to another Mr. Thukman. Mr. President, I am compened to go to another room in the Capitol. The hour has passed at which I ought to have been there. I shall, therefore, only make two observations in regard to what has been said, and then submit to the Senate whether we shall come to a vote on this bill to-day or not. First, in regard to the fact that these companies have never paid the 5 per cent. on all net earnings which it is admitted they are bound to pay. The excuse is that the Government and the companies differ as to what is 5 per cent. that the Government and the companies differ as to what is 5 per cent. of the net earnings. That is no excuse for the companies not paying into the Treasury what they admit to be 5 per cent. of the net earnings. They were bound to pay at least into the Treasury what they admit they owe, and if the Government claims more than that, all that they could say is, "We will resist what you claim over and above what we admit we owe."

One word more. The Senator from Louisiana has said that there is only a certain portion of the Central Pacific Railroad upon which the carnings are to be calculated and 5 per cent paid into the Treasury.

to wit, about eight hundred miles out of twelve hundred miles. I do not so read the charter at all. If I am not mistaken, there is not one mile of the Central Pacific Railroad from San Francisco to its union with the Union Pacific Railroad that is not a land-subsidy and bonded road.

Mr. WEST. I do not believe anybody disputes that.
Mr. THURMAN. Very well.
Mr. WEST. The other four hundred miles run to other parts of the country, to Oregon.

Mr. THURMAN. If it is the four hundred miles which run to Oregon, if the Senator does not know it, I think he can find out by the least inquiry that it has made no net earnings at all, and of the net earnings the whole eight millions have been made by that part of the road which is confessedly bound to respond to the Government by 5 per cent. of its net earnings. I think the Senator will find, if he will make inquiry, that so far from this four hundred miles having produced net earnings to that company they have been a load to the company, and therefore the whole amount of these eight million and odd dollars of net earnings of that company have been by the operation of that part of its road which the Government contributed to build by its land subsidy and by its bonds. Therefore there is no reason whatever for deducting from those $8,000,000 any portion whatever in ascertaining what are the net earnings of that road.

We made in the Judiciary Committee the most careful estimate whether this bill would be so oppressive to the roads that they could not live under it, and so far from that being the case, on the best not live under it, and so far from that being the case, on the best estimate that we could make, if this bill becomes a law, even in the present depressed state of business, the two principal ones, the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific, can pay from 3 to 4 per cent. annual dividends to their stockholders upon the market value of their stock at a time when not twenty roads in all the United States are paying any dividends at all. Take the great State of Ohio. I know of but one single road in Ohio that is paying dividends to its stockholders. There is a larger number in the New England States, but I certainly am correct in saying that in the years 1874 and 1875 not forty railroads in the United States paid dividends to their stockholders, and I think I would be in fact correct if I were to say that not twenty did it.

Our bill does not require of these railroad companies as much as the Government annually pays interest on its loan to them, and that leaves them so much of their net earnings that they can distribute from 3 to 4 per cent. dividend on the market value of their stock, and yet it is talked about as a bill that is oppressive to these companies, to companies that have been in default from the very moment that their obligations accrued to the Government! No, sir, that will not their obligations accrued to the Government! No, sir, that will not do. This bill is simply to determine whether these companies shall continue to set the Government at defiance, it is simply to determine whether the Government is to lose more than $200,000,000, or whether whether the Government is to lose more than $200,000,000, or whether by making these companies comply with the obligations which they solemnly assumed that sum shall be saved to the Government.

Mr. President, I would be very glad indeed, as I must be out of the Senate for several days, and as this bill was put in my charge by the Judiciary Committee, if we could take a vote upon it to-night. If the bill is to pass, as I said before, it cannot pass too soon; if it is to be defeated it cannot be defeated too soon; so that the time of Congress may not be wasted further upon it. The appropriation bills will be here in a day or two. If this bill is to pass over, they will take precedence of it, and it is gone for this session. I therefore hope that the Senate is prepared to vote upon it now. At least I hope that that question will be decided. I hope that some Senator will make a motion that will test the question whether the Senate will vote on this bill this day. It can be done by a motion to go into executive session, or to adjourn, or any other motion. I hope that that motion will be made so that we may know whether we are to go on and finish this bill to-day or not.

The SPEAKER. - The Chair lays before the House the following communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of the second section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, 1877, the undersigned, associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States assigned to the first, third, eighth, and minth circuits, respectively, have this day selected Hon. Joseph P. Bradley, the associate justice assigned to the fifth circuit, to be a member of the commission constituted by said act.

Respectfully submitted.

ADDITIONAL TEMPORARY POLICE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to call up for action at this time the concurrent resolution of the Senate now on the Speaker's table in regard to the appointment of one hundred men to serve as a special police at the Capitol during the counting of the electoral vote. I have been instructed by the Committee on Rules of the House to offer a similar resolution. I believe this is a question of privilege.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will yield for a few moments to allow some requests for unanimous consent

Mr. KASSON. I presume there will be no objection to the resolution called up by the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there should not be any.
Mr. BANKS. This is a privileged question. It concerns one of the highest privileges of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so rules. The Clerk will read the concurrent resolution:

current resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the Sergeantsat-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives respectively be, and they are hereby, authorized each to appoint fifty men to serve as a special police at the Capitol during the canvassing of the votes for President and Vice-President, or for such portion of said time as they shall deem necessary, said special police to be paid equally from the contingent fund of the Senate and of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the House concur in the Senate resolution with an amendment substituting the word "counting" ate resolution with an amendment substituting the word "counting" for the word "canvassing," and I shall call the previous question on the concurrent resolution with that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is subject to the point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BANKS. Make your point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make some inquiries in regard to this; and if I find that the resolution is in accordance with the precedents I shall not insist that it shall be considered in Committee of the Whole. I do not remember that it has been found necessary heretofore to I do not remember that it has been found necessary heretofore to create so large a police force in connection with the inauguration of the President.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] that this money is to be paid out of the contingent funds of the two Houses already appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; but the rule covers moneys to be taken out of an appropriation already made or which shall be made. But I do not wish to make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana does not make the

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to make the point of order; but I wish to reserve it. If this appointment is conformable with the practice hitherto, I shall not insist on the point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] perhaps can tell us when it has been customary to place the Capitol to this extent under surveillance or not. I do not wish to see a new rule established at this time increasing a quasi-military force about the Capitol unless there is some precessity for it.

time increasing a quasi-military force about the Capitol unless there is some necessity for it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Committee on Rules have considered this question and have instructed me to report a resolution similar to that received from the Senate. We know very well that the American people generally on occasions like this behave themselves. They had excellent order during the centennial exhibition—but with eight hundred police. We do not anticipate any difficulty, but we thought it wise that the officers of the two Houses should have power to keep a way clear between the Senate and the House, so that the Senate on retiring to consult may have the opportunity of passing to their Chamber without difficulty. It is possible also that there may be a class of men known as pickpockets here, and we desire to protect those who come to witness the proceedings. I ask the previous question on the resolution.

tion on the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought that this report was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Banks,] but I observe now that it was made by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] and I should like to know from him whether it has been found necessary heretofore to create this quasi-military force about the Capitol on the occasion of counting the electoral vote, and whether it has been done heretofore.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand that it has.

Mr. HOLMAN. If this is in conformity with what has been found prudent and necessary heretofore I shall not object.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman will remember that the colice force about the Capitol has been very largely reduced and that the police of the city are, at present, in a state of demoralization.

Mr. BANKS. There never has been an occasion where the votes for

Mr. BANKS. There never has been an occasion where the votes for President and Vice-President have been counted when the force of the Capitol was so small as it is now. It was suggested to the Committee on Rules in such a manner that they could not overlook it, but while it was not absolutely necessary it would be very wise to take this precaution, and the committee could not do otherwise than make this report to the House. The police force of the Capitol is not now so large as it has been on occasions of this character. I do not limit it to the accounting of the vote but to any occasion of great interest. so large as it has been on occasions of this character. I do not limit it to the counting of the vote, but to any occasion of great interest when the two Houses have been called together. Now every one knows that this is a time of great interest in regard to counting the vote, and it is a small matter for the two Houses to provide for additional force to preserve order in the Capitol.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have been informed by members of the House that our dordespers on vestorday for example, were almost

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have been informed by members of the House that our doorkeepers, on yesterday, for example, were almost overpowered by disreputable citizens, or men perhaps not worthy the name of citizens. They have made complaint that they are scarcely able to maintain order in the galleries, and we consider the passage of this resolution as imperatively necessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. The American people in managing their affairs generally conduct themselves in good order, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] will remember that in 1861 there was not so large a police force about the Capitol as there is now. Since then I admit that the Capitol police has been largely increased, but it is now diminished, and diminished as it is, it is larger than it was in 1861 or prior to that time. I have never heard of the necessity for increasing the force on the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and I have witnessed quite a number of such counts.

President, and I have witnessed quite a number of such counts.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The officers of the House complain now of disorder and they are almost overpowered.

Mr. BANKS. The situation is very different to-day and will be tomorrow from what it has been ever before.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution of the Senate was concurred in concurred in.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

ADMISSIONS TO THE HOUSE.

I rise to a privileged question. I submit from the Committee on Rules the following resolution:

Resolved. That during the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President no person besides those who now have the privilege of the floor of the House of Representatives shall be admitted to that portion of the Capitol set apart for the use of the House and its officers, except upon tickets to be issued by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and that the tickets to be issued under this resolution shall be distributed under the direction of the Committee on Rules of the two Houses.

Our rules designate the persons who shall have the privilege of the floor. The rule is as follows:

134. No person except members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, the President's private secretary, foreign ministers, the governor for the time being of any State, Senators and Representatives elect, judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, and such persons as have by name received the thanks of Congress, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives or any of the rooms upon the same floor or leading into the same; provided that ex-members of Congress who are not interested in any claim pending before Congress, and shall so register themselves, may also be admitted within the Hall of the House; and no persons except those herein specified shall at any time be admitted to the floor of the House.

A MEMBER. That mile has not been always at the second.

A MEMBER. That rule has not been observed.

A MEMBER. That rule has not been observed, but it is the right of every member to call for its observance. Owing to the throng of people who will be in this Hall to-morrow, the Committee on Rules thought it advisable to provide that the persons eligible to admission to the Hall of the House, which includes the list I have read, shall be included in the resolution. The resolution cuts off all the clerks of committees, both of the Senate and the House, for our rules do not allow the clerks of committees to be on the floor, but the rules of the Senate allow the clerks of committees of that body to be upon the floor; so that we adopt language referring to the privileges of the House alone. The committee also propose under their own regulation, as they are providing for the order of the day to-morrow, that tickets shall be issued, three to each of a certain class of officers and three to each of the Members and Senators, and three only. These are shall be issued, three to each of a certain class of officers and three to each of the Members and Senators, and three only. These are tickets for the galleries, and we understand authoritatively that these galleries can only seat eight hundred persons. There have been twelve hundred persons packed into these galleries, and we propose the twelve hundred tickets shall be issued, and only twelve hundred. We can make no other provision to provide for proper decorum in the proceedings to moreover.

make no other provision to provide for proper decorum in the proceedings to-morrow.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] whether, in view of this being a joint session in which both the Senate and House will participate, there ought not to be some joint provision made by the two Houses, or the Senate may provide a rule of admission different from ours?

Mr. COX. I would say to my friend from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] that the Committee on Rules of the Senate met to-day with the Committee on Rules of the House and a similar resolution will be offered in

Mr. KASSON. I only wanted to avoid any question of privilege on the part of the Committee on Rules of the Senate. Mr. SINGLETON. Does this resolution apply to any but the galleries for the families of members?

Mr. COX. To all the galleries except the diplomatic gallery, which is controlled by a special rule of the House.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I desire to ask a question. Is it the intention of the committee to issue tickets for each day, or to issue tickets for the entire number of days that the count may progress?

Mr. COX. Each day a new ticket will be issued; every day the count goes on each member will receive three tickets. We do not know how these galleries may be packed, and we have therefore limited the number for the first day to three tickets to each member. If we find that we can issue more tickets we will do so. I hope the House will leave that to the discretion of the committee.

Mr. HALE. How do the members get these tickets?

Mr. COX. They will be sent to each member and reach him by his mail to-morrow morning; they are being printed now.

Mr. O'NEILL. They should be sent to members before to-morrow

We are doing our best to forward the matter.

Mr. O'BRIEN. How many persons will each ticket admit?
Mr. COX. One only. I now call the previous question.
The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMISSION ON ELECTORAL COUNT.

Mr. HUNTON. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, upon which I call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I give notice that, after this resolution has been disposed of, I will call for the regular order.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved. That the members of the commission on the part of the House of Representatives appointed under provisions of the bill entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," have permission to sit as members of said commission during the sessions of this House.

Mr. KASSON. Is that necessary, in view of the provisions of the act itself? The act imposes the duty. Of course there is no objection to the resolution if it is deemed necessary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offering it is a member of the commission, and the Chair supposes it is necessary.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT POLICE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MILLIKEN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the testimony taken by the select committee of the House investigating the affairs of the board of police of the District of Columbia be printed and recommitted.

Mr. KASSON. Not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider. The SPEAKER. That is the understanding.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Quite a number of gentlemen have propositions which they wish to bring before the House, and which will not give rise to debate, and I will not for the present insist upon my call for the regular order.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask consent to report from the Committee on the Judiciary certain bills for the removal of political disabilities.

Mr. HALE. Are they personal bills?

Mr. HUNTON. They are.

Mr. GARFIELD. Individual bills, not personal bills?

Mr. HUNTON. Individual bills.

The first bill was House bill No. 1558, with Senate amendments, to remove the legal and political disabilities of Robert Ransom, of Virginia.

The amendments of the Senate were to strike out the words "legal and" in line 2 of the bill, and in lines 3 and 4 strike out the words "act of July 2, 1862, and the" before the words "fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States;" so that the bill would

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

The title was amended so as to read:

An act to remove the political disabilities of Robert Ransom, of Virginia.

The next bill reported from the committee was House bill No. 2736, with a Senate amendment, to remove the political disabilities of N. H. Van Zandt.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out the words "act of

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask consent to report for consideration at this time, from the Committee on the Judiciary, a bill to remove the political disabilities of Thomas Conner, of South Carolina.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let the petition be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable House of Representatives of the United States:

The petition of Thomas Conner, a citizen of the State of South Carolina, respectfully shows that he was United States attorney for the district of South Carolina in the year 1860, and prays to have any disabilities which attached to him by reason of holding said office removed.

JAMES CONNER.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot see that any political disabilities attached to the person by the reason of holding such an office. If that is the character of the petition it does not meet what is required.

Mr. HURLBUT. That certainly is not a proper petition.

The SPEAKER. There being objection, the bill is not before the

THOMAS KEARNEY.

Mr. HANCOCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, submitted a report in writing upon the bill (H. R. No. 1747) for the relief of Robert Kearney; which was ordered to be printed and recommit-ted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD ACCIDENTS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals a bill to provide for the more thorough investigation of accidents on railroads. No member of the House needs to be reminded of the dreadful railway disaster that occurred at Ashtabula, in my district, a few weeks since, surpassing in its accumulation of horrors any that has ever occurred in the history of railroads. The bill provides for means to inquire generally into the causes of such accidents, and to obtain such information on the subject as may enable the engineers of the country to devise new safeguards for the traveling public. I understand the committee has the general subject under consideration. The bill was drafted at my request by Charles Francis Adams, jr., of Massachusetts, who is perhaps more thoroughly acquainted with the great questions connected with railways than any other American. I submit with the bill a letter from Mr. Adams, which I think will be of value to the committee and to the House.

It has been suggested that a special bureau should be created by Congress to procure statistics upon the subject. But I do not think that is necessary. It has been a fault in our legislation in recent years that we have multiplied bureaus too much. The bill I offer assumes no authority over railroads and creates no new national office. It requires a board of officers of Army engineers to examine and report upon such accidents especially as result from constructions of engineers. I should be equally well pleased if the duty were enjoined upon the commission recently created for the purpose of testing iron and steel. Up to the present moment, the cause of the Ashtabulla disaster does not appear to have been ascertained. The questions of practical engineering science involved in that accident are of the highest importance, and I hope Congress will aid in making such inquiries as may solve it. I ask that the bill and letter may be published, and I move that the Committee on Railways and Canals may have leave to report on the subject at any time.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4558) to provide for the more thorough investigation of accidents on railroads was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, with authority to report at any time, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD with the accompanying letter. The bill and letter are as follows:

A bill to provide for the more thorough investigation of accidents upon railroads.

A bill to provide for the more thorough investigation of accidents upon railroads.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to appoint a board of three commissioners, who shall be officers of engineers of the Army, to inquire into the number, causes, and means of prevention of accidents on railroads in the United States, the number of persons killed or injured thereby, and the most approved means of preventing the occurrence of the same. And it shall be the duty of said commissioners to hereafter investigate such accidents on railroads as may in their judgment be accompanied by circumstances of an unusual or unexplained character, and specially report upon the same.

SEC. 2. That the commissioners appointed under this act shall, in addition to their pay as officers of engineers of the Army, receive compensation for actual travel and other necessary expenses incurred in the duties herein designated.

SEC. 3. That, in addition to all special reports from time to time made, the commissioners herein provided for shall at the close of each year forward to the Secretary of the Treasury a general report upon the subject of accidents upon railroads in the United States during that year, which report, together with any special reports which the commissioners may have made during such year, shall be submitted to Congress.

Congress

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS

BOARD OF MASSACHUSETTS, BOARD OF RAILROAD COMMISSIONERS,
Boston, January 27, 1877.

Dear Sir: In compliance with the suggestions contained in your favor of the 20th instant, I herewith send you a draught for an act establishing a national commission to inquire into accidents upon railroads; a national railroad accident commission, in fact.

You will notice that the draught is very simple, and my object has been to carefully avoid all disputed points. I have taken the inspectors of the British board of trade as the model and appointed Army officers, so avoiding the creation of any new offices.

fully avoid all disputed points. I have taken the inspectors of the British board of trade as the model and appointed Army officers, so avoiding the creation of any new offices.

The commissioners have no executive powers whatever. They can only investigate and report. That is all the British inspectors can do, and all that the Massachusetts commissioners can do, and experience shows that that is enough. They are able to locate responsibility and give publicity.

They cannot summon witnesses, take evidence under oath, or institute any legal proceedings. The commissioners in Massachusetts cannot either, but they have never found these powers necessary.

They cannot call on railroad corporations for reports of accidents or for returns; they must rely for information on State officials, on the newspapers, on the voluntary co-operation of railroad officials. This is a practical defect in the act. It would not, however, be overcome without raising the dangerous question of jurisdiction and State rights. This I thought best to avoid. No one questions the right of the General Government to investigate anything and everything; and where not only citizens of other States, but the United States mails, are continually destroyed through accidents on railroads, the propriety of the United States instituting investigations into the causes of such accidents ought not to be questioned.

Finally my object has been to carefully avoid trying to draw up a complete and comprehensive measure. That can only develop itself in its own way. This is simply a seed. If anything comes of it, it can easily be developed in any way which practical experience shall show to be needed. United States commissioners can be authorized to conduct investigations, summons, witnesses, &c. All this and many other things which will at once suggest themselves could readily be put in the bill; but I think it is much better without them; they will come as they are needed.

As it stands the act will meet the case, and I do not see how any one can object to it.

CHARLES F. ADAMS, JR.

Hon. James A. Garfield, Washington.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM COLORADO.

Several members called for the regular order. Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that the first business in order is the unfinished business coming over from last evening. If not, I wish to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the legislative appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The business unfinished at the adjournment of the House yesterday was a matter of the highest privilege. The Clerk will read the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary and now pending. The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Colorado is a State in the Union, and that James B. Belford, Representative-elect from said State, be sworn and admitted to a seat as such.

The SPEAKER. In addition to this being unfinished business, the Chair considers it a question of the highest privilege. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to inquire how much time this debate is expected to consume.

The SPEAKER. Four hours, so far as the Chair is informed. Is that the understanding  $\hat{f}$

Mr. HOLMAN. Yesterday I believe one hour or more was occupied in reading the report. Time is now of great value on account of the present condition of the appropriation bills. I trust it will be understood that the time occupied last evening in reading the report is to be regarded as a portion of the four hours.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] to give notice that there were to be three hours of debate, and that then the previous question would be called, giving a fourth hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware that it has been usual to regard the reading of a report as coming out of the time alotted for debate; but if the point should be raised and insisted upon, the Chair would be obliged to rule that the reading of the report was in the nature of debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky to say yesterday (though it was not said while he was on the floor) that the reading of the report was in lieu of his speech.

Mr. HURD. I desire in the first place to have read by the Clerk the first, third, fourth, and fifth sections of an act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

The Clerk read as follows

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado included in the boundaries hereinafter designated be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves, out of said Territory, a State government, with the name of the State of Colorado; which State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. That all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory, at the date of the passage of this act, shall be qualified to be elected, and they are hereby authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention under such rules and regulations as the governor of said Territory, the chief-justice, and the United States attorney thereof may prescribe; and also to vote upon the acceptance or rejection of such constitution as may be formed by said convention, under such rules and regulations as said convention shall be apportioned among the several counties in said Territory in proportion to the vote polled in each of said counties at the last general election as near as may be; and said apportionement shall be made for said Territory by the governor, United States district-attorney, and chief-justice thereof, or any two of them; and the governor of said Territory and chief-justice thereof, or any two of them; and the governor of said Territory and the proventive of them; and the governor of said Territory as shall, by preclamation, order an election of the representatives aforesaid to be held throughout the Territory at such time as shall be fixed by the governor, chief-justice, and United S ates attorney, or any two of them, which proclamation shall be issued within ninety days next after the last day of September, 1875, and at least thirty days prior to the time of said election; and such election shall be conducted in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said Territory regulating elections therein for members of the honse of representatives; and the number of members to said convention shall be the same as now constitutes both branches of the Legislature of the aforesaid Territory. Sec. 4. That the members of the convention thus elected shall meet at the capital of said Territory, not more than sixty days subsequent to the day of election, which time of meeting shall be contained in the aforesaid proclamation mentioned in the hird States attorney, not more than sixty days subsequent to the day of election, which t

Mr. HURD. Mr. Speaker, on the last day of the Forty-third Congress the act containing the foregoing provisions was passed by the House of Representatives. It was passed without discussion under the operation of the previous question and in the midst of the excitement usually attendant upon the closing hours of a session. As will be observed, one of its sections provided that the people of Colorado health and the province of the province of the contract of the province of th should call a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitu-tion, and after its adoption that an election should be held at which a Representative for Colorado should be chosen to a seat in the Con-gress of the United States. The convention was held as provided by law; the election was held as authorized by the constitutional congress of the United States. The convention was held as provided by law; the election was held as authorized by the constitutional convention; and Mr. Belford at that election received a majority of the votes cast for Representative in Congress, and presents to this House a certificate signed by officers assuming to act as officers of the State of Colorado. It is not disputed, Mr. Speaker, that the election was regularly held, nor that the certificates are in proper form; but it is insisted that Colorado is not a State in the Union, and that therefore Mr. Belford is not entitled to a seat upon this floor.

There is no one who will dispute the proposition that unless Colorado be admitted into the Union Mr. Belford is not entitled to his seat. The question thus presented upon the credentials that have been referred to the Judiciary Committee is, has Colorado been admitted as a State into the Federal Union? First, Mr. Speaker, what is admission into the Union? It is the permission of an organized body-politic to enter into the political association created by the Constitution of the United States. On the part of the people of the State seeking admission it involves the organization of a State government and the establishment of a form of institutions which will permit the State when in the Union to stand in it on an equal footing with the other States. On the part of the United States it involves the ascertainment of the facts necessary to constitute admission and the declaration of the result in the methods fixed by the Constitution. The people of the new State obtain from the people of the United States the right to enjoy the privileges and exercise the powers sion and the declaration of the result in the methods fixed by the Constitution. The people of the new State obtain from the people of the United States the right to enjoy the privileges and exercise the powers which the latter possess under the Constitution. This change in political condition can only be effected by the consent of both the United States Government and the people of the State, and that consent is to be expressed by admission of the State into the Union.

How then, Mr. Speaker, is a State to be admitted into the Union? The language of the Constitution is clear and distinct on this point, "The Congress of the United States may admit new States into the Union." The Legislature of the United States, created by the Constitution, admits States. They must be admitted by the forms of legislation, in the methods of legislative proceedings prescribed by the Constitution itself. From the very phrase of the Constitution it is apparent that in the discharge of this duty Congress must exercise the same discretion which it is bound to use as to every other measure of legislation. There are three particulars as to which this discretion is required: First, the Congress of the United States must decide that the government which has been created by the new State is republican in form, because the language of the Constitution is that is republican in form, because the language of the Constitution is that Congress may admit new States into this Union; and as this Union is a union of republics, the State which seeks for admission into the Union must be a republic, and therefore must have a republican form of government. Secondly, Congress must see to it that the new State shall stand in the Union on an equal footing with the other States, for that cannot be called a union in which there is inequality in the rights enjoyed by its members. In the third place, it must be ascertained that a State government has been formed, with proper officers to administer it, for the language is, "new States may be admitted into the Union." Therefore the State must be complete in its governmental form, in its ability to exercise its governmental functions, and with officers to perform them.

It will follow from these propositions that if Congress must exercise discretion as to these three matters, the State government must be first formed and the constitution first adopted before that discretion can be exercised.

It seems to me the very statement of the proposition must carry conviction to every mind; for if the judgment of this House be invited as to the question whether a State government has been formed in Colorado, must not the House know whether a government has been formed there or not? If this House is called upon to determine whether the constitution and government of Colorado are republican in form, must not the constitution and government have been framed in the first instance before Congress acts, in order that Congress may intelligently determine the questions so submitted for decision? This, Mr. Speaker, will be more clear from the very words used in the Constitution, "Congress may admit new States into the Union." It is not "new States may enter into the Union;" it is not that by the mere formation of a constitution, as is claimed by the majority in their formation of a constitution, as is claimed by the majority in their report, a State ipso facto becomes a member of the confederation of the States; but it is that there shall be an act of admission on the part of the Congress of the United States. If I extend an invitation to a gentleman to my house, to be admitted at the door upon presentation of a card which he is to offer to the servant standing there who has the right by my authority to permit him to enter, he who stands at the door must inquire whether the condition which I have imposed has been complied with. If an individual is to be admitted into an organization upon certain conditions, he has no right to enter until the organization has determined that the conditions have been performed. And as the Constitution in this case has devolved upon Congress the power and duty of admitting into the Union upon the conditions contained in the Constitution, Congress must examine the constitution of the State and the form of government to determine whether the conditions have been complied with or not.

Mr. Speaker, this right involves the submission to Congress of the constitution and government of a new State, and I had supposed, since the great Missouri case, there would be no dispute on this subject on the floor of this House. In that case the State of Missouri adopted a constitution under the terms of her enabling act. It was submitted to the Congress of the United States, and for months one of the most brilliant discussions which ever occurred in the Congress of the United States continued, in which many of the ablest men of the country participated.

It was insisted upon the one side that by the very adoption of the constitution of Missouri it became a State in the Union. On the other constitution of Missouri it became a Congress to examine the conit was insisted that it was the duty of Congress to examine the constitution and government, and that Missouri could not be regarded as in the Union until Congress had passed a law admitting it. All the precedents which had occurred before that time were carefully and thoroughly examined; and the conclusion arrived at after all that discussion by a decided vote was that Missouri was not admitted into the Union by reason of the adoption of the State constitution, and that its form of government must be accepted by the Congress of the United States. A law was then passed approving the constitution of Missouri and imposing a further condition upon the State, and from that day to this, excepting, in the case of Nevada in 1864, no State has been admitted into the Union until after its constitution and government have been submitted to the Congress of the United States and a law been passed by the legislative power declaring it to be a State in the Union.

This doctrine is well fortified by authority. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, page 30, says:

There are always in these cases questions of policy as well as of constitutional law to be determined by the Congress before admission becomes matter of right: whether the constitution is republican in form; whether the proper State boundaries have been fixed upon; whether the population is sufficient; whether the proper qualifications for the exercise of the elective franchise have been agreed to; whether any material evil exists in the Territory which is now subject to control, but which might be permitted under a State government. These and the like questions, in which the whole country is interested, cannot be solved by the people of the Territory for themselves, but the final decision must rest with Congress, and the judgment must be favorable before admission can be claimed or granted.

In Wisconsin this exact question arose, and it was decided (in 2 Pinney's Wis. Reports) in these words:

The State constitution was adopted in March, 1848, but the Territory was not admitted by act of Congress as a State until May 20, 1848. Held, that the adoption of the constitution by the people of the Territory did not create it a State, and that such political change could be effected only by the action of Congress admitting it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if these propositions be correct, this is the condition of the argument: Congress must exercise a discretion to determine whether a republican form of government has been established in Colorado and whether its constitution complies with the conditions which are imposed by the Constitution of the United States and by the enabling act. Congress can only do this upon the submission to it of the constitution and of the frame of government which the records of Colorado here adverted.

submission to it of the constitution and of the frame of government which the people of Colorado have adopted.

I come now to the question, Has Congress passed upon the constitution and government of the State of Colorado? What action has it taken upon this subject? It is not claimed that the Forty-fourth Congress has acted upon this subject at all; but it is insisted that the provisions of the act which were just read by the Clerk have admitted Colorado into the Union before the constitution was adopted and before the government was framed by the Porty-third Congress. The first section authorized the people to form a constitution and government; the third section imposed certain conditions; that the people of Colorado should adopt a constitution and government republican ment; the third section imposed certain conditions; that the people of Colorado should adopt a constitution and government republican in form and not inconsistent with the provisions of the Declaration of Independence, a constitution which should guarantee perfect religious toleration to every person within the limits of the State, and which should provide that the people outside of the State, and citizens of the United States, should not be taxed at a higher rate than the people who lived within the State. The last section provided—and to this I desire to call the attention of the House particularly—that on the convention assembling it should approve the Constitution of the the convention assembling it should approve the Constitution of the United States or accept it, and should then form a constitution and United States or accept it, and should then form a constitution and government, and, upon that constitution being adopted and being in accordance with the Constitution of the United States and with the conditions of the enabling act, that it should proceed to submit the same to the people, and that, when that instrument had been submitted to the people, the result of the vote should be ascertained by the governor of the State, who should send the result, if favorable to its adoption, to the President of the United States with a copy of the constitution, and that then the President of the United States should issue his preclamation dealaring the State admitted into the United issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union, and that thereupon Colorado should be ipso facto a State in the Union without any further action on the part of Congress whatever.

Mr. Speaker, on this act I observe as follows: First, that it does ant. speaker, on this act I observe as follows: First, that it does not itself undertake to admit the State of Colorado at once. It simply provides for the formation of a constitution and government and declares that upon the fulfillment of certain conditions it shall be admitted into the Union. It arranges for its future admission. In the next place it does not seem to contemplate any further action on the part of Congress. Indeed the very language of the law is that on the proclamation of the President being issued the State shall be admitted without further action of Congress.

Now, I submit in passing that the Forty-third Congress had not the power by this action to prevent any subsequent Congress from doing its duty in this regard. If without this provise in the law of the Forty-third Congress the Forty-fourth Congress would have had the right or power to decide whether the constitution of Colorado was republican in form, nothing done by the Forty-third Congress can deprive this body of that right, and the act in that regard is wholly null and void. Thirdly, Mr. Speaker, this act authorizes either the President of the United States or the convention which is held in the State of Colorado to decide whether the conditions imposed by the enabling act have been complied with. The language is that the President shall issue his proclamation and thereupon the State shall be admitted. The further expression in the fifth section is that, upon the convention adopting the constitution which shall comply with the conditions of the act, the question as to the adoption of the constitu-tion shall be submitted to a vote of the people. No other power is called upon to decide whether those conditions have been complied with except the convention of the people of Colorado in the first in-stance and in the next the President of the United States.

From the consideration of this act it appears then, first, that the Forty-third Congress did not admit Colorado directly; next, Colorado has not been admitted by the Forty-fourth Congress, because the action of the Forty-third Congress made it unnecessary that the constitution of Colorado should be submitted to it; and thirdly, that upon the proclamation of the President, and upon that alone, this State was to be admitted into the Union. That proclamation, it is conceded, has been issued. I desire to call the attention of the House especially to the last clause contained in it:

And therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do declare and proclaim the fact that the fundamental conditions imposed by Congress upon the State of Colorado have been ratified and accepted and that the admission of the said State into the Union is now complete.

Here the President has undertaken to perform the duty which I have shown can be performed only by Congress. He has decided that the government of Colorado is republican in form. He has determined that the constitution of Colorado is not inconsistent with the Declaration of Independence and that it guarantees within its territorial limits equal religious liberty. He has adjudged that the other provisions contained in the enabling act have been complied with. These grave constitutional questions, involving the exercise of the highest legislative functions, Congress has not even considered, and their decision has been transferred from the authority estaband their decision has been transferred from the authority established by the Constitution to determine them to the chief executive officer of the United States. The proposition thus presented is, had Congress the right to delegate to him the power to decide the questions which in themselves involve all there is of the admission of a State? This brings me to the question whether Congress can delegate to others legislative authority.

Upon the general proposition that legislative power cannot be delegated, I think there will be no dispute.

In Coolev's Constitutional Limitations, page 116, it is said:

In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 116, it is said:

One of the settled maxims in constitutional law is that the powers conferred upon the Legislature to make laws cannot be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority, there it must remain, and by the constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the constitution itself is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism these high prerogatives have been intrusted cannot relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be devolved, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign trust.

That expresses the general rule on the subject; and when the Congress of the United States has a duty devolved upon it by the Constitution in express language to admit a State, it must perform that duty itself; it cannot delegate the authority to any other tribunal or to any individual.

By the act under consideration, Congress declared that Colorado should be admitted on the happening of a certain event to be de-clared by the President. Both the event on which the admission was contingent, and the declaration of the President, required the action by others, which it was the duty of Congress to take. While admit-ting the general proposition as to the delegation of power, the major-ity of the committee insist that Congress has power to pass laws to take effect upon the happening of some future or contingent event, and that it was, therefore, competent for Congress to pass such an act as this. Now I do not dispute the proposition that Congress has the power to pass conditional laws; but it has not the power to pass laws to take effect upon every contingency. On this question I quote the language used in the case of Rice vs. Foster, 4 Haw., (Del.,) 88, as follows

Doubtless the Legislature may pass many conditional laws, but there are many conditions which would make the law inoperative.

And consequently the question, in a given case, is not whether Congress can pass a conditional statute, but whether the conditions are such as are permitted by the rules of the law. I shall undertake to show that the conditions in the case are such as to render the law in-

And right at this point I desire to call attention of the House to a few thoughts upon this subject expressed in a speech recently de-livered in the Senate by one of the most gifted orators of the age, who discussed this question incidentally in his masterly argument upon the bill creating the electoral commission. He said that—

The President had made that proclamation evidential of that contingency, and the act of Congress speaking afresh when the condition is complied with, Colorado is as complete in her rights as a member of the Union as is the proudest or most ancient State in all the sisterhood. * * * That court—

The Supreme Court of the United States

long ago held in the embargo case that such legislation in advance incomplete, in-conclusive, and inoperative until the happening of an external contingency, is com-petent and becomes effectual when the contingency occurs.

I refer to these remarks to call attention to the decision made in the embargo cases to which the distinguished Senator alludes. I do not propose to discuss those cases, but to refer to a commentary made upon one of them by the supreme court of Pennsylvania. In Parker vs. Com., 6 Barr, 531, it was said:

In the case of The Aurora vs. The United States, 7 Cranch, 382, the right of Congress to enact this law was called in question, but the Supreme Court of the United States held that Congress might extend and revive the act of 1809 conditionally, upon the occurrence of subsequent events, to be ascertained by the President's proclamation. It is plain the revival or continued suspension of the act of 1809 was not made to depend upon the proclamation, but upon independent facts, of which the proclamation was evidence, after which the statute operated proprior viance.

It will be seen that the embargo cases are not precedents for the act admitting Colorado, unless the condition on which Colorado is admitted consists of a fact independent of the law-making power, of which the proclamation merely furnishes the evidence, and unless the act when passed, containing the condition, was complete as an expression of the legislative will. That the law under discussion does not fall within these distinctions, and that unless it does it must be held inoperative, a further consideration of the authorities will more fully show.

In Barto vs. Himrod, 4 Selden, 490, it was said:

But such a statute when it comes from the hand of the Legislature must be law in præsenti to take effect in futuro. If the observations already made are correct, the act of 1845 was not such a statute. But if by the terms of the act it had been declared to be law from the time of its passage, to take effect in case it should receive a majority of votes in its favor, it would nevertheless have been invalid, because the result of the popular vote upon the expediency of the law is not such a future event as the statute can be made to take effect upon, according to the meaning and intent of the Constitution.

The event or change of circumstances on which a law may be made to take effect must be such as in the judgment of the Legislature affects the question of the expediency of the law—an event on which the expediency of the law depends. On this question of expediency the Legislature must exercise its own judgment definitely and finally. When a law is made to take effect upon the happening of such an event, the Legislature in effect declares the law inexpedient if the event should not happen, but expedient if it should happen. They appeal to no other man or men to judge for them in relation to its present or future expediency. They exercise that power themselves, and then perform the duty which the constitution imposes upon them. But in the present case no such event or change of circumstances affecting the expediency of the law was expected to happen. * * * The event on which the act was made to take effect was nothing else than the vote of the people on the identical question which the constitution makes it the duty of the Legislature to decide. The Legislature has no power to make a statute dependent on such a contingency, because it would be confiding to others that legislative discretion which they cannot delegate or commit to any other man or men to be exercised.

In the same case, page 490, Willard, J., said:

In the same case, page 490, Willard, J., said:

The future event gives no additional efficacy to the law, but furnishes the occasion for the exercise of its power.

In Rice vs. Foster, 4 Harr., (Del.,) 492, it is said:

A law, when passed by the Legislature, is a complete, positive, and absolute law in itself, deriving its authority from the Legislature, and not dependent for the enactment of its provisions upon any other tribunal, body, or person. It may be limited to expire at a certain period, or not to go into operation until a future time, or the happening of some future event, or until some conditions be performed. * * * All such laws are complete and positive in themselves when they pass from the hands of the Legislature, and are not to become law by the creative power of other persons. But the legislators are invested with no other power to pass an act which is not a law in itself when passed, and has no force or authority as such, and is not to become or be a law until it shall have been created and established by the will or act of some other person or body.

In the same case, Harrington justice, said:

In the same case, Harrington, justice, said:

It is conceded by all that legislative power cannot be delegated. That case assumes that the Legislature may pass a conditional law. Both of these propositions are true. The error in the argument is in supposing them to be alternative or inconsistent. Doubtless the Legislature may pass many conditional laws, but there are many conditions which would make the law inoperative. * * * But a law declaring an offense, or prescribing a punishment, or repealing an existing law, on condition that the governor or any other individual shall assent to it, is as plainly unconstitutional. It substitutes for, or rather adds to, the legislative will another will, which it makes necessary to the existence of the law. This is unconstitutional

In Parker vs. Com., 6 Barr, 526, it is said:

In Parker vs. Com., 6 Barr, 526, it is said:

These remarks are applicable to our own act of assembly, and to them may be added an instance of another and vital distinction between it and the legislation of Congress. In the latter instance, the power which created the law was exerted by the Federal Legislature, looking to no external aid, but the production of our senate and house of representatives came forth maimed, impotent, functionless, until inspired by the popular breath. In the one case the decree is, this statute shall take effect in action or its operation be suspended upon the occurrence of a particular event. In the other, this act shall be inoperative unless otherwise willed by the people. In the first case the law remains quiescent until the happening of the appropriate event stirs it into activity; in the last the so-called law was altogether without the power of motion of itself when it left the hands of the law-makers. And this is the distinction between a conditional law, properly so denominated, and an act of the law-making power seeking to transfer its functions to another; the one leaves nothing to be done to perfect the rule of action; the other but molds the clay into shape, leaving to third persons the task of breathing into its frame the energy of life.

In Sapto vs. Lowa. 2 Lowa.

In Santo vs. Iowa, 2 Iowa, 203:

In Santo vs. Iowa, 2 Iowa, 203:

The General Assembly cannot legally submit to the people the proposition whether an act should become a law or not; and the people have no power in their primary or individual capacity to make laws. * * * There is no doubt of the authority of the Legislature to pass an act to take effect upon a contingency. But what is a contingency in this sense and connection? It is some event independent of the will of the law-making power as exercised in making the law, or some event over which the Legislature has not control. * * * The will of the law-maker is not a contingency in relation to himself. It may be made in relation to another and external power, but to call it so in relation to himself is an abuse of langnage. Now, if the people are to say whether or not an act shall become a law, they become or are put in the place of the law-maker. And here is the constitutional objection. Their will is not a contingency upon which certain things are or are not to be done under the law, but it becomes the determining power whether such be the law or not. This makes them the legislative authority, which, by the constitution, is vested in the senate and house of representatives, and not the people.

Now, without wearying the patience of the House by reading other Now, without wearying the patience of the House by reading other authorities, I submit that the following conclusions may be derived from them as to the nature of the condition which it is proper to incorporate into a law: 1. The contingency or condition upon which a law is to take effect must be some event independent of the will of the law-making power as exercised in making the law, and over which the Legislature has no control. 2. The condition must be one which operates in the execution or suspension of the provisions of the law, but not in the creation of such provisions. 3. The contingency cannot be one which involves the exercise by any other power of that cannot be one which involves the exercise by any other power of that discretion which the Legislature itself must exercise. 4. The law must come complete and positive from the Legislature; and the contingency upon which the act is to take effect, whether it happens or not, must be such as, relating only to the future execution of the law, leaves it in all respects as it was enacted: a complete expression of the legislative will.

By applying these propositions to the present case, I maintain that the condition is not one upon the happening of which a law may take effect. It must be recollected that the legislative act to be performed is the admission of Colorado, the condition upon which the act is to take effect is the adoption by the people of a constitution and government of a certain character, and the proclamation by the President of the fact, declaring the State to be admitted into the Union.

In the first place, I say that this is not a condition independent of the legislative will, but entirely dependent upon it and over which the Congress has complete control. Would the proclamation of the President have admitted the State of Colorado into this Union or would the action of the convention of the Territory of Colorado have done so if Congress had not enacted a law declaring to that effect? Could not the Congress in an hour after it had passed the law have repealed it, taking from the President the power to issue the proclamation and from the convention which framed the constitution the power of de-from the convention which framed the constitution the power of determining whether the conditions of the enabling act had been complied with? It is a condition created by legislative authority, by Congress, and not independent of it in any sense whatever. It is substantially making the will of the law-maker, expressed by extra constitutional methods, a contingency in reference to itself.

Secondly. It is not a condition which operates in execution of a law previously passed, but it is a condition which operates to create the provisions of the law. The issuing of the proclamation of the President does not carry out any provision of a law which has previously admitted Colorado; but it completes the law, for Colorado is only admitted when the President so declares. The proclamation could not have been issued in the execution of an act of Congress admitting the State, for there was no such law to be executed until after the the State, for there was no such law to be executed until after the proclamation had been published.

Thirdly. The condition is one which involves on the part of the President of the United States the very same discretion which Congress is required to exercise. Congress, not the President, is to determine whether the conditions have been complied with; Congress, not the President, is to determine whether the constitution of the State is republican in form and whether a State government has been established. This act delegates to the President the very power, the very authority which Congress itself must exercise; and this is plainly prohibited, as I have shown, in the great case from New York. The legislative authority has no power to make a statute dependent upon an event which involves the decision of the identical question which the constitution makes it the duty of the Legislature to decide. the constitution makes it the duty of the Legislature to decide.

the constitution makes it the duty of the Legislature to decide.

Fourthly. Did this law come complete and perfect from the hands of the law-making power, as is required by the fourth limitation to which I have referred? No, sir; it was imperfect, inchoate. The State was not in the Union; it possessed no rights, no powers, no privileges as a member of the Union until after the proclamation of the President had been issued.

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the President of the United States had refused to issue this proclamation, either Colorado would not be in the Union or it would be. If it be not in the Union when he fails to issue the proclamation, then the proclamation becomes necessary to its entering the Union, and the legislative power has invited an extraneous authority to aid in the discharge of the legislative obligation. If it be in the Union when the President fails to issue the proclamation, then it is in the Union in violation of a law of Congress and not If it be in the Union when the President fails to issue the proclama-tion, then it is in the Union in violation of a law of Congress and not in accordance with the law of Congress, for that power has provided that it shall not be in the Union until the President has issued his proclamation. Whether, therefore, you say that the proclamation is not necessary or is necessary, the law, in the latter case, is incomplete and inchoate, because it required the act of another to consummate it; and in the former case the law is a nullity, for no act of legislation can become effective as a law in violation of the method fixed by its own provision. own provision.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, upon this review of the authorities and as-certainment of the limitations upon the doctrine of conditional legisla-tion, that the condition imposed in this law falls within the prohibcertainment of the limitations upon the doctrine of conditional legislation, that the condition imposed in this law falls within the prohibited ones, and that it was not competent for the Congress of the United States to pass such a conditional law; that it amounted clearly to a delegation of legislative authority, which is prohibited in all civilized and constitutional governments.

If these propositions be correct, Colorado has not been admitted into the Union. It is not possible that it could have been admitted into the Union under the provisions of the act passed by the Fortythird Congress. I call attention to the fact with which every member of the House is familiar, that at the last session Colorado was a Territory, and was then represented here by a Delegate. If it has ceased to be a Territory it must be because of some act which has been performed by the Forty-fourth Congress, and yet it is known that this Congress has not acted upon the subject at all. Can it be possible that the action of any other Congress prior to this can admit a State into the Union at a time when the Forty-fourth Congress is in full power, with full capacity and ability to determine every question relating to the nature of the government which the people of Colorado may form? I say not. To do that is by conditional legislation of this sort, by transfers of legislative authority, by delegations of legislative power, to enable one Congress to tie the hands of subsequent Congresses for all time.

Mr. Speaker, it is claimed that there are precedents for the admission of States into the Union in the manner in which Colorado is supposed to have been admitted, and the acts of admission of Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, and Nevada are cited. Now, in order that a case should be a precedent, it must involve two things: first, that the case of Michigan there is no analogy whatever between its facts and those in the present case. There, after the constitution had been adopted, and it had been approved by Congress, a further condition was imposed relative to its boundaries. After the condition had been adopted a second act of admission was passed, reciting the fact that the condition imposed had been complied with. Congress examined and approved the constitution, and after having imposed further conditions, decided by an act of legislation that they had been complied with when the people of Michigan reported their action on the subject. The case of Missouri is also cited. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is a case directly in point in establishing the proposition which is here maintained. The Congress of the United States, as I have before stated, engaged for months in the discussion of the questions as to its powers under the Constitution in admitting States, and particuits powers under the Constitution in admitting States, and particularly whether it was required to pass upon the constitution of the new State. The decision reached was that it was the duty of Congress to approve the form of government submitted. In that case, disapproving it, Congress imposed a new condition, requiring the Legislature to give a certain interpretation to a clause of the State constitution, and providing that upon the passage of the law giving such interpretation the governor of the State should certify the fact to the President, who should issue his proclamation declaring it, and that thereupon Missouri should be a State in this Union.

It is manifest that the case of Missouri affords no precedent for the method of admission adopted for Colorado. (1) The constitution and government formed were examined and approved by Congress in the one case, and not in the other. (2) The Missouri act admitted the State to the Union, and only delayed the taking effect of the law until a certain condition had been performed. In the Colorado case there was no legislative act admitting the State, except through the President in the Colorado case there was no legislative act admitting the State, except through the President in the Colorado. dent's proclamation. (3) The proclamation of the President in the Missouri case was issued to announce the fact that he had received a copy of a certain act of the Missouri Legislature within a certain The proclamation in the Colorado case was issued not to announce merely that a copy of a constitution had been received, but to declare Colorado admitted into the Union. In the first case the act was purely a ministerial one to announce a fact, in the second case it was a legislative one to decide as to the form of the constitution and government which the people had adopted, and to admit a

What has been said in relation to Missouri applies with equal force to the admission of Nebraska. After the people in that case had formed their constitution and government, they were submitted to Congress, whereupon an act was passed accepting, ratifying, and confirming said constitution and government, and declaring that the said State of Nebraska was thereby admitted into the Union. Another section of the act declared that it should not take effect until the Legislature should determine in favor of equal suffrage, and that when a copy of an act of the Legislature should be received by the President, he should issue a proclamation announcing the fact. Here the condition was, as in the case of Missouri, one which related only to the taking effect of a law which, when it had been passed by Congress, was complete and perfect as an expression of the legislative will upon the subject-matter.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that the State of Nevada is a precedent against the view I have maintained, but Nevada was admitted in 1864 in the midst of war. There was little discussion on this constitutional question which is now presented. I believe there were only four demo-cratic Senators at that time in the Senate of the United States. In cratic Senators at that time in the Senate of the United States. In that discussion one distinguished gentleman, Senator Garret Davis, of Kentucky, opposed the bill upon the ground that it amounted to a delegation of legislative power, and said that it was useless for him then in that excitement to make any objection to the bill, but nevertheless that he desired to be put upon the record against it.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, this precedent born in the midst of civil war, in the excitement attendant upon it, with the heats and passions then caused and developed without our world on the part of many war, in the excitement attenuant upon it, with the nears and passions then aroused and developed, without any regard on the part of many of the people of the country for the obligations of the Constitution, shall not outweigh all the other precedents of the Government from the beginning as to the duty of Congress in admitting States, and as to the manner in which it shall be discharged.

It is objected to this bill that in the Senate the Senators from Colorede have been admitted to their seats, and that therefore this

It is objected to this bill that in the Senate the Senators from Colorado have been admitted to their seats, and that therefore this House is bound to admit Mr. Belford. Mr. Speaker, the action of the Senate well considered would be regarded, I have no doubt, as of high authority by this House; but when, as here, there was no discussion on the particular question involved in the reports now under consideration, when the action was taken hastily at the opening of the session, I submit what has been done is not entitled to the weight of a precedent.

Besides this is not a new take the

Mr. Speaker, it is claimed that there are precedents for the admission of States into the Union in the manner in which Colorado is supposed to have been admitted, and the acts of admission of Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, and Nevada are cited. Now, in order that a case should be a precedent, it must involve two things: first, that the examination and approval of a State constitution by Congress after it has been adopted are unnecessary; and secondly, that the power to determine as to the form of the constitution and government may be delegated to some other authority or tribunal. Now I deny that any precedent which can be cited covers these propositions. In the the House and in three days after that it passed that body, so for more than a week at that period this situation continued: Indiana represented in one branch of the Government and not in the other; and the only way by which in the other branch representation was given to the State was by the very method reported to this House by the minority of the committee, by passing a law declaring that the State was in the Union.

It may be said the people of Colorado will be without government

It may be said the people of Colorado will be without government if the minority report is to prevail. Not so. It has a government; and whether you call it a territorial government or State government, it is a de facto government, which gives to its people the same rights and privileges and protection which a government de jure would.

It has been insisted, Mr. Speaker, that this objection to the admission of Colorado is an after-thought, and that it is made only for the purpose of affecting the count of the electoral vote. I regret very much that this consideration has entered at all into this discussion. It is a question Mr. Speaker, of the gravest constitutional nature and one much that this consideration has entered at all into this discussion. It is a question, Mr. Speaker, of the gravest constitutional nature, and one which should be decided without any appeal to partisan prejudice, and without any reference to partisan considerations. It relates to more than one hundred thousand people living within the limitsof Colorado. It affects the interests of forty millions of people who dwell within the Union to which Colorado desires to be admitted. It is a question which concerns the sovereignty of a community, which affects its power as an independent political organization, and which will determine whether it shall be sovereign within the Union, or whether it shall remain in a condition of territorial dependence. It is a question, as suggested by the distinguished gentleman to whom I have already referred, that has lighted the flames of civil war, drenched lands with blood, overturned the oldest dynasties, and broken as though they blood, overturned the oldest dynasties, and broken as though they were pipe-stems the pillars of the strongest governments. It is a question, therefore, which should be decided in the light of the Constitution, and precedents, and the law. When we walk in the paths our fathers have marked out for us on this subject we walk in safety.

fathers have marked out for us on this subject we walk in safety. Away from them, at every point and on every hand is danger.

I firmly and conscientiously believe, Mr. Speaker, if the general principle involved in this bill as to the delegation of legislative power, and to some extent involved in another important bill which has passed at this session, shall prevail, that disorder and confusion will overwhelm our whole system; that distinctions between the legislative, executive, and judicial departments will be entirely abrogated; that the symmetry of the federal plan will be destroyed, and that sooner or later an empire will lift itself out of the rains of the Republic. Legislative responsibility becomes a myth, for when a trustee can delegate his power the trustee ceases to have responsibility.

Accountability of a man in legislative position to the people and his constituency perishes from the Republic if he can escape account-ability by showing that an objectionable act has been performed by another to whom he has delegated the power which the Constitution has conferred upon him.

Mr. Speaker, as soon as this theory is adopted thoroughly in legislation the obscuration of the light of representative government begins only to be ended in its total eclipse. I desire to read the warning words of one of the ablest jurists of New York in discussing this very question. In Barto vs. Himrod and Lovett, (4 Seldon's Reports,) Judge Willard said:

If this mode of legislation is permitted and becomes general it will soon bring to a close the whole system of representative government which has been so justly our pride. The Legislature will become an irresponsible cabal, too timid to assume the responsibility of law-givers and with just wisdom enough to devise subtle schemes of imposture to mislead the people. All the checks against improvident legislation will be swept away and the character of the Constitution will be radically changed.

Mr. Speaker, the minority of the committee reports to this House a bill admitting the State of Colorado. The constitution of the State and what was done under it in the formation of a State government have been reported to the Judiciary Committee, and the minority of the committee are satisfied that the conditions of the enabling act have been complied with. We, therefore, report as was done in the Indiana case, a bill which admits the State seeking admission into the Union. I ask that the bill reported by the minority may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union.

An act for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union.

Whereas, on the 3d day of March, 1875, Congress passed an act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and offered to admit said State when so formed into the Union upon certain conditions therein specified;
And whereas it appears that the said people have adopted a constitution which, upon due examination, is found to conform to the provisions and comply with the conditions of said act and to be republican in its form of government, and that they now ask for admission into the Union: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the constitution and government which the people of Colorado have formed for themselves be, and the same archereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and that the said State of Colorado shall be, and is hereby, declared to be one of the United States of America, and is hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever.

Mr. McCRARY obtained the floor.
Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] I believe has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.
The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HATCHER.) The time of the gentleman from Ohio had expired.

Mr. BUCKNER. With the consent of my friend from Iowa, [Mr.

MCCRARY,] I ask to have read for information an amendment which I desire to offer to the bill reported by the minority of the committee. The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the bill reported by the minority the following:

"And the people of Colorado having elected a Representative to this Congress in pursuance of authority conferred upon them by the act of Congress aforesaid, the election of said Representative is hereby ratified and confirmed and said Representative is hereby ratified and confirmed and said Representative is hereby admitted to a seat in the House of Representatives."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution in reference to the issuing of tickets of admission to the Capitol during the count of the electoral vote; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM COLORADO.

Mr. McCRARY. The speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Hurd,] like everything he says upon this floor, is exceedingly able and ingenious; but at the same time I am sure that it will appear to gentlemen who will carefully look at the question that it is altogether fallacious. The legal proposition upon which he bases his argument is not open to dispute. No gentleman will claim that the legislative power which is conferred upon Congress by the Constitution can be delegated to the President or anybody else. But the fallacy of the gentleman's argument is in the misapplication of the legal principle which he enunciates.

On the 3d of March, 1875, Congress passed an act which both Houses and the entire country understood to be an act admitting the State of Colorado into the Union upon certain terms and conditions. In pursuance of that act, and in strict accordance with it, the government of Colorado was formed, the constitution of that State was adopted, proper certificates were transmitted to the seat of Government, the proclamation of the President of the United States was issued, the territorial government was disbanded and a State government was organized and set in motion. After all this it is said that the act of Congress did not admit the State of Colorado into the Union. After all this it is said that the State of Colorado is not a Union. After all this it is said that the State of Colorado is not a State in the Union and not entitled to representation on this floor. Now, sir, let us look at the act of Congress. I would have no quibbling with my friend from Ohio upon the legal proposition that he announces. I take issue with him upon the meaning of the act of Congress providing for the admission of Colorado into the Union. I deny that it was an attempt to delegate to the President of the United States the power of admitting that State into the Union. Let us look at the act itself. Every gentleman understands that one of the modes whereby we interpret an act is by reference to the title. Look, then, at the title of this act and see what its purpose is:

An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The purpose of the act itself was the admission of this State into the Look at the very first section of the act, which declared-

That the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado included in the boundaries hereinafter designated be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves, out of said Territory, a State government, with the name of the State of Colorado; which State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever, as hereinafter provided.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now read the proviso.

Mr. McCRARY. The State when formed in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be admitted into the Union, not by a proclamation of the President, not by future action of Congress, but by virtue of this act itself.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the honorable gentleman read the proviso in connection with that portion of the act?

Mr. McCRARY. I have read the entire section.

Mr. SPRINGER. The proviso to that section is on the first page of the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. McCRARY. I have read the entire section. There is no province in it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The proviso to which I refer is in the fourth section. It provides that the constitution shall be republican in form. Mr. McCRARY. It will come to that point by and by.

Mr. SPRINGER. I refer to the provision concerning race, color,

Mr. McCRARY. What I am now attempting to show is the intent and purpose of Congress in passing theact, and to do it I show its title wherein it declares that it is an act for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union, and I show that in the first section of the act it is declared that upon the forming of a constitution and government in accordance with this act, the State of Colorado shall be admitted into the Union.

Now I agree, sir, that there are certain things which by this act are to be done, which are to be evidenced by the proclamation of the President of the United States announcing that they have been done. I agree, too, that there are certain provisions in this statute concernlagree, too, that there are certain provisions in this statute concerning the character of the constitution which should be adopted. It is stated by the bill offered by the minority that all those provisions have been complied with. But, sir, suppose that were not so. Does anybody claim that after the proclamation was issued, after a State government was set in motion, after the territorial government had been destroyed, after a State judiciary has come into existence, after a State Legislature has been formed, and after the governor and State officers had been elected and installed, that after all these the question could be raised whether the constitution was in accordance tion could be raised whether the constitution was in accordance with the enabling act? I think not, sir. I think the power is with Congress to remedy any defects of that kind.

Sir, if the Constitution is not republican in form or violates any of the fundamental principles of the enabling act, we have the power to remedy the defect. Why, sir, suppose the oldest State in the Union should to-day amend her constitution by inserting in it a provision not republican in form, does any gentleman say that that would put the State out of the Union? Not at all, sir. It would only bring into exercise the power which, by the Constitution, is conferred on Congress to guarantee to every State a republican form of government. That a State has adopted a provision in her constitution ment. That a State has adopted a provision in her constitution which is in violation of the Federal Constitution does not put it out of the Union, nor does it cease to be a State because it has done such a thing, but the power to remedy it is in the Congress of the United States under the Constitution.

Now, sir, look again at this act. Section 5 contains this provision:

And if a majority of legal votes shall be cast for said constitution in said proposed State, the said acting governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances; whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how can any gentleman claim, in view of that language, that it was not the purpose of Congress in the passage of this act by the act itself to admit the State of Colorado into the

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, although I do not desire to interrupt him? Did not the admission of Colorado into the Union depend upon the affirmative vote of the people in the ratification or rejection of the constitution of the proposed State?

Mr. McCRARY. It depended undoubtedly upon the adoption of the constitution by the vote of the people.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the people then had voted against the constitution the State would not have been a State in the Union by virtue

Mr. McCRARY. Undoubtedly the President would not have issued his proclamation declaring it a State if the people had not voted in favor of the constitution.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the question of the decision whether it was a State or not depended upon whether the people of Colorado voted one way or another on this question.

Mr. McCRARY. The admission of Colorado into the Union, Mr. Speaker, like the admission of many other States of the Union, depended upon the happening of certain events or certain facts, and the happening of these facts was to be evidenced by the proclamation of the President of the United States. If the gentleman will excuse me, I will refer to some illustrations on that point in a moment. Now, again reading further from this act and keeping in view all the time the question whether it was the intention of this act to admit the State of Colorado into the Union by its own force, I call the atten-tion of the House to section 6 of the act, which is as follows:

SEC. 6. That until the next general census said State shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, which Representative, together with the governor and State and other officers provided for in said constitution, shall be elected on a day subsequent to the adoption of the constitution, and to be fixed by said constitutional convention; and until said State officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution, the territorial officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices.

Now, sir, there is a provision for the election of a Representative to Congress on a day to be fixed by the constitutional convention without any further legislation on the part of Congress, without waiting for any further legislation. Assuming unquestionably, as the act does, that the State was to be admitted into the Union under this act, it proceeds to provide for the election by the people of the State, as soon as its admission is complete under this act, of a Representative in Congress. In pursuance of that law the people of Colorado have elected their Representative, and he is now here asking to be admitted to his seat.

Now, sir, it is no new thing in the history of this country that a State should be admitted into this Union by an act similar to this. State should be admitted into this Union by an act similar to this. There are several States in the Union to-day which came in under legislation almost identical with the bill admitting the State of Colorado, particularly the State of Nevada, in which the language of the act upon this point is verbatim with the language of the act for the admission of Colorado. And there are some others to which I wish to call the attention of the House.

Take the case of the State of Indiana to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Hurd] has referred. I hold that it is a strong case in our favor. The act to enable the people of the Territory of Indiana to form a State constitution and government contained this provision:

That the inhabitants of the Territory of Indiana be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and to assume such name as they shall deem proper; and the said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon the same footing with the original States in all re-

Under the authority thus conferred the people of Indiana proceeded to frame their constitution and to organize a State government, and elected their Representatives and Senators in Congress and appointed their electors in the presidential election of 1816. On the assembling of Congress, after the formation of the State government of Indiana, and before any action of Congress whatever had been taken upon the character of the constitution, or upon admitting the State of Indiana by any formal act, Mr. Hendricks appeared as the Representative and was admitted to his seat by the House of Representatives. He came here under precisely the same circumstances as those under which the gentleman from Colorado comes to-day, and he was admitted. ted. It is true that in the Senate some question was made, and upon deliberation it was thought to be proper, merely as a measure of caution, to pass a resolution declaring Indiana to be one of the States of the Union. But in the House of Representatives no such resolution was adopted, and the Representative was admitted without question. In that case no proclamation announcing the admission of Indiana into the Union had been provided for, and therefore the present case is in that respect a better one for the claimant of a seat than the Indiana case was

The case of Missouri is a very strong precedent in favor of the position which I take here to-day. That State was admitted, after a long debate, by a bill which provided that it should come into the Union upon an equality with all the other States upon condition that the Legislature of the State of Missouri should do certain things. Upon those things being done it was provided as follows:

Whereupon, and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into this Union shall be considered as complete.

The Legislature of the State of Missouri was to enact certain laws, was to enter into certain stipulations with the National Government. When she had done so the fact was to be certified to the President of when she had done so the fact was to be certified to the President of the United States, and upon the fact being certified the President was to issue his proclamation, and thereupon, without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, Missouri was to be considered a State in the Union. This condition was subsequently complied with; the President's proclamation was issued August 10, 1821, and from that day to this no man has ever raised the question as to whether Missouri was a State in the Union.

And I say here without fear of contradiction that every principle and I say here without lear of contradiction that every principle involved in the bill admitting Colorado was involved in the legislation which admitted Missouri. If it was a delegation of power to the President of the United States to admit Colorado, it was a delegation of power to him to admit Missouri. It matters not what the character of the condition may have been in the one case or in the other. If an event or a series of events was to take place, and the fact that it had taken place was to be attested by the proclamation of the President of the United States, and if this applies in both cases, then Missouri is a precedent for Colorado.

Then take the case of Michigan. On the 15th of June, 1836, there was passed an act to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of Michigan into the Union upon the terms therein expressed, the constitution which the people of Michigan had previously framed for themselves was ratified, and it was proright had previously framed for themselves was fathed, and it was provided that when the boundaries set forth in the act should receive the assent of a convention of delegates of said State she should be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the other States without any further action on the part of Congress."

When the fact was certified to President Jackson that the people of Michigan had complied with these conditions, it happened that Congress was in session, and he sent his message to Congress saying that if Congress had not been in session he would have recognized the evidence that came before him and considered the State of Michigan as regularly admitted into the Union; but as Congress was in session he thought proper to lay the matter before Congress.

The State of Nebraska was admitted into the Union by an act which contained several fundamental provisions which were to be complied with by that State before it was to be considered as admitted into the Union. And as I have already said, the State of Nevada came into the Union under an act precisely similar to the Colorado came into the Union under an act precisely similar to the Colorado act. And so I might say with regard to the State of West Virginia, which came into the Union in the same way.

I will not detain the House by reading from these several organic acts. I will say that from the beginning it has been a common practice to admit States into the Union upon conditions, with provisos that before they should be considered as admitted or before the acts admitting them should be considered as having taken effect, certain things must transpire and certain acts must be done, and those things should be attested by the proclamation of the President of the United States.

Now what will be the consequence of declaring that Colorado is Now what will be the consequence of declaring that Colorado is not now a State in this Union? What would be the condition of the people of Colorado if Congress should now declare that Colorado is not a State of this Union? By our own law we declared that if the people of that Territory should do certain things it should be a State in the Union without any further action whatever on the part of Congress. In pursuance of our own legislation they have disbanded their territorial government, they have formed their State government, they have organized their judiciary, and they are living to-day ment, they have organized their judiciary, and they are tring or any under a State government, with a governor, a Legislature, and all the departments of a State government.

A judge, appointed by the President of the United States to hold the district and circuit court within the State of Colorado, is holding those courts in that State to-day. If the people there have no State government, they have no government at all. Every sheriff who attempts to serve process is guilty of trespass or assault; every sheriff who attempts to execute a prisoner is guilty of murder; every authority in that State is set aside and there is no government there who tree if Colombia in the State is set as ideand there is no government there whatever, if Colorado is not a State.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is not the government in Colorado at this time a de facto government, and to all intents and purposes as good with regard to the people of Colorado as a de jure government?

Mr. McCRARY. Mr. Speaker, if there is no State there, if there is no State organization, if there is no State constitution, if there is no State Legislature, there can be no State laws; the laws and the officers of the law have not even the color of authority. In order to be even a de facto government it must be a government that is not a usurpation, a government that is based upon a constitution and laws. The territorial government is clearly abrogated; if the State government is set in motion without authority of law, it is null and void. Besides, it is a dangerous thing to leave the people of any part of our Union without a government de jure.

Sir, it would be bad faith toward the people of Colorado to refuse now to admit their Representative. It would be treating those people as we have never treated the people of any State or Territory in ple as we have never treated the people of any State or Territory in this Union. I cannot suppose that this House will refuse to admit the Representative from that State.

Mr. HILL. I wish to ask the gentleman whether in all previous cases of this kind, except Nevada, it is not true in point of fact that the State constitution was laid before Congress and pronounced by Congress republican in form before the proclamation of the President issued ?

Mr. McCRARY. I am very glad the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hill] has called my attention to that point, for I intended to mention it. I think it is not true that in all cases the constitution was submitted to Congress. I am sure that in at least a number of the earlier cases where States were admitted into the Union the constitution was never submitted to Congress at all. For instance, the constitution of Kentneky was never submitted to Congress. I repeat what I said a moment ago, that the remedy for a defect in a State constitution is not in keeping the State out of the Union nor attempting to put it out after it gets in; but the power to remedy a defect of that sort is given to Congress under the constitutional provision that Congress "shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government." I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Hale.]

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I have read with great care the very elaborate and able report of the minority in this case, drawn by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] who spoke this morning. I have also listened to his speech, which was as full of ingenuity and of strong logical thought upon the matters which make the basis of his report as a speech could well be; thought upon the nature of the conditions on which an act of Congress may be made to take effect. But neither in the report nor the speech do I find anything which to my mind makes strongly against this broad proposition, that Congress in this case has passed an act which by its title and express terms authorizes the people of Colorado to do certain things in setting up a State government and provides for the admission of that State when the government is so set up. So far as the action of Congress goes, it has by the enabling act done everything that Congress needs to do to authorize the setting up of this State; and as if to exclude any doubt, it declares in terms that no further action shall be needed to be taken by Congress. Now we have here, if the people of Colorado follow out the directions given to them, a State that is to present herself here by her elected member.

But it is said that Congress should now intervene and by an act such as the gentleman from Ohio has appended to his report declare that the State has conformed to the provisions of the enabling act. But I find, as has just been explained by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCrary,] that in the early history of the Government, more than once, after the people of a State, formerly a Territory, had enacted a constitution in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, had elected State officers had set up a State government. acted a constitution in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, had elected State officers, had set up a State government, and had sent members to the House of Representatives and Senators to the other branch, they were admitted at once, no question being raised such as is raised here. Ifor one am willing to stand upon that proposition and those precedents. That this view of the case and these precedents have force, was shown two months ago, when this matter came up at the other end of the Capitol; for on turning to the first day's proceedings in the Senate of the United States, as given in the RECORD of the 5th of last December, I find that-

The President pro tempore presented the credentials of Jerome B. Chaffee, elected by the Legislature of the State of Colorado a Senator from that State; which were read.

He also presented the credentials of Henry M. Teller, elected by the State of Colorado a Senator from that State; which were read.

The President pro tempore then announced that "the Senators-cleet, who are present, will please advance to the desk and take the constitutional oath;" whereupon Mr. Chaffee and Mr. Teller, to-gether with a gentleman who had been lately elected to fill out an unexpired term from the State of Maine, advanced and took the oath of office as Senators.

present in the Senate such good constitutional lawyers, such sticklers for the observance of forms and laws and constitutions as the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] both Senators from New York, [Mr. CONKLING and Mr. KERNAN,] the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD;] and I do not find that any voice was raised in the Senate of the United States against swearing in either of the two Senators who had been, as declared by the President of the Senate, elected by the "State of Colorado." So much upon the question of the law and the precedents.

There is another consideration of a practical nature, which has be-fore been touched upon, the good faith that we owe to these people. Colorado has been struggling for admission for twelve years, seeking to become a State in the Union; has once failed, though a bill for that purpose passed both Houses; has come here again; has received the sanction of Congress; has complied with every detail of legal provision required from her people by the enabling act passed by Congress. It is not claimed by those advocating the minority report that in any regard Colorado has failed; and so far as the "taking effect" is concerned, the President by his proclamation has declared what everybody admits, that she has complied. A State government has been set up and all the paraphernalia of organization has been put on in the once Territory and now State of Colorado. The United put on in the once Territory and now State of Colorado. The United States Government, aside from this House, has recognized it in every branch, the Senate by admitting its Senators and the law department of the Government by sending United States judges to act as judges in the State or new district created of Colorado. To-day, under an act passed since the enabling act by both Houses without objection, as I believe, there is a United States court now in session in the capital of Colorado exercising all the powers there as a State of the Union that any other United State court exercises in any State of the Union that any other United State court exercises in any State of the Union, no matter how long back the date of its admission into the Union. And both parties, in a political sense, are committed to the admission of the State without further question. It is bad enough—
Mr. SOUTHARD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question, and that is, whether that does not provide these courts shall be established when this State is admitted into the Union? That is the very thing to be determined.

Mr. HALE. I did not believe there was any doubt until to-day on the presentation of these reports as to the State of Colorado being recognized. It is recognized by the Government under the act. What I was saying when interrupted was this, that we are all committed to the proposition that Colorado to day is full-clad in the garments of a State. It is not, as shown by the discussion and report, in any degree a party question. Gentlemen will remember when the subject is recalled how eagerly both parties six months ago were claiming each that it had carried the State of Colorado. There was no question then of the territorial organization remaining or that the State was not completely within the Union, with a right to elect a governor and Leg-islature and member of Congress to sit upon this floor. I remember the picturesque illustrations in the newspapers, with columns set up by each side and Colorado in each as a State in the Union. Yet, notwithstanding that, notwithstanding the action of the Senate, notwithstanding the action of the Executive, notwithstanding the action of the legal department of the Government, for two months her member has been shut from our doors. The important business of a new Commonwealth has drifted without direction on this floor. If a member or citizen of that State is required to call the attention of Congress to its needs, he has been forced to do it through some other member, making him his mouth-piece.

I appeal to gentlemen whether it is a good thing for us here in this House alone, either because of fine argumentation on a narrow point of law, or any fancied advantage which may be gained in any political way to longer hold out and keep the Representative of this State from his place on this floor where the rest of us sit. The State is today populatively entitled to be admitted. It is to-day, from the magnitude of its interests and industries, entitled to a place on this floor, all the forms having been complied with. It cast in the last election a vote as large as five of the States. It cast a larger vote than two of the older States, so it is not a rotten-borough system which has brought it here

In the early stages of the controversy arising in reference to the admission of that Territory I was not in favor of its admission to this floor, for the reason that I did not believe that it had come up to the standard in growth we should require. But all that is past and gone. It has good fundamental reasons for admission, if we were considering the original question of an enabling act why it should be admitted as a sister State. It has gone on as other States have gone, and it presents itself here having conformed with everything required by Congress, precisely as the last State admitted into the Union, which was admitted with little or no question. Congress should stand ready to admit its member and not keep him out further.

Mr. McCRARY. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Banks.]

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. Knorr] has reported a resolution to admit the member from Colorado to his seat as a member of the House. Having first called the attention of the House to the glain of the waysher. first called the attention of the House to the claim of the member-These proceedings were on the first day of the session; and I find elect for the State of Colorado, I may perhaps be justified in express-that a few minutes before, upon the roll-call, there were found to be ing, very briefly, my views of the merits of this resolution. I listened attentively to the elaborate and critical and very able argument of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Hurd.] It surprised me that he could put so much into it that does not belong to the question, and leave so much out which, in my view, does belong to it. From my point of view it is a very simple proposition, which admits of no doubt whatever. I will state it as briefly as it is in my power to do.

The Constitution declares (article 2, section 3) that "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." It is virtually an assent and consent that Congress is authorized to give to the admission of new States, and the word "consent" is used in the same paragraph when the formation of new States carved out of territory because graph when the formation of new States carved out of territory belonging to existing States is spoken of, in connection with their admission to the Union. It is in fact a declaration that Congress may give its consent to the formation of new States, and admit them to the Union under such conditions as it may think just and proper.

New States, Mr. Speaker, cannot be formed without the consent of the people belonging to the territory to be included in the State. So here are two propositions of fact: One is that Congress may consent to the admission of new States formed out of new territory or out of the territory of pre-existing States, and the other is that the people the territory of pre-existing States, and the other is that the people of the territory proposed to be admitted as a State either desire or consent to the admission. That is substantially the question we now have before us, nothing but that, and upon that ultimately the House will pass its judgment. I know that every Congress that admits new States admits them upon certain specified conditions. One is that the government of the State shall be republican in form; that it shall make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, and not be repugnant to the Constitution or the principles of the Declaration of Independence. Other conditions were embraced in the act of the Forty-third Congress for the organization of the State of Colorado. It was to secure by irrevocable ordinance perfect toleration in religious oninions. No person should be disturbed in toleration in religious opinions. No person should be disturbed in person or property on account of the mode of religious worship. The people of the State were to disclaim forever all right and title to unappropriated lands within its limits and agree and declare that they appropriated lands within its limits and agree and declare that they should belong to the United States; that equality of taxation of lands should be secured to resident and non-resident owners, and that no tax should be imposed on lands or property of the United States. These are all the conditions specified, which are inseparably connected with the territory out of which the new State is created. But, Mr. Speaker, every member of the House must have noticed that these conditions are irrevocable and perpetual. They are enduring, and to endure forever; and the conditions upon which Colorado is admitted into this Union by the act of 1875, unless modified by the consent of parties will endure as long as the State of Colorado en consent of parties, will endure as long as the State of Colorado endures, as long, we hope, as the continent itself shall endure. How unjust then it is to assume that this or some other Congress must enact a statute declaring that these irrevocable and perpetual condi-tions imposed upon Colorado have been complied with and that each and every conditional obligation has been literally and exactly per-formed before it can be recognized as a State or admitted to representation in this House.

We have a far more enduring security than any such statute can confer. It exists in the fact that the rights of the people of the State of Colorado are held subject to the exact and perpetual performance of the conditions specified in the act authorizing them to form a State government. No statute can strengthen this enduring title of the United States. Colorado herself is incapable of giving us a more complete acknowledgment of our rights than is embraced in the enabling act by which and through which she became a State, be-cause the security it claims it has taken for all time, a statute recognition of the fact that she has performed every condition imposed upon her people by Congress, would rather weaken than strengthen it, because it might hereafter be assumed by her successors that all the claims and demands of the United States had been satisfied and acknowledged by its government and the State relieved thereby from any further duty on the part of its people or their successors. This is, in my judgment, the relation of the State to the Union of which it has become a member, whether or not a statute of satisfaction and recognition by Congress be passed now or passed hereafter. It will be an open question hereafter to be submitted to the action of Congress whenever any, even the slightest, departure from these fundamental conditions is made by the State, what remedy exists and in what manner it is to be administered by the Government of the United States. I do not assume that there is any impropriety in such an act as that now proposed as an amendment to the resolution of the committee for the admission of the member-elect from Colorado, but that it should not be allowed to deprive the State of its right of representation or impair the just legal effect of the President's proclamation declaring Colorado one of the States of the Union.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Ohio has stated what may sometimes be admitted to be a correct principle of law and what may not be be admitted to be a correct principle of law and what may not be admitted to be a correct principle of law, that a Legislature cannot under any circumstances delegate its authority. I will not dispute that question with him or with the House, but I call the attention of the House to the particular act which Congress has performed in regard to the State of Colorado. What act has it required of its people that could be completely and finally executed and performed in the year 1875 or in the year 1876? What condition has it required of them? Only one, just one-no more and no less-and that was that the people of the Territory of Colorado should form a State constitution subject to the conditions of the enabling act, and at a public election called in pursuance of the provisions of law give their as to its admission to the Union of the States upon the conditions thus specified. That is all. And when this election was held and the return made to the President required by the act of 1875, then in point of fact, so far as its people were concerned, the State of Colorado was admitted to the Union. When the election was held, when the people had declared that they would become a member of the Union according to the conditions prescribed, and had reported their action to the President, as prescribed by the act authorizing them to form a constitution, and had organized a State government, nothing more remained for them to do.

Congress delegated this power and authorized this political action and organization by the act of 1875 to the people of Colorado. Will the honorable gentleman from Ohio or any other member of the House the honorable gentleman from One or any other member of the House say that this is a delegation of legislative authority? No, sir. There is no legislation in the act of the people of Colorado assenting to the proposition to become, upon the terms prescribed, a member of the Union of States. That is not legislation. An election is not a legislative act. It is an act of administration, not of legislation. And that is the only act we have here on the part of the people of the State. Congress has not thus far despoiled itself of its legislative authority or power. In what manner has it, then, abdicated its legislative duty?

There is one other proposition which can be considered by any possibility as interfering with the functions of the two Houses of Congress, only one other—and that is the duty imposed by the act of 1875 upon the President of the United States. That act declares that, by an ordinance of the constitutional convention, the constitution formed by the people of the Territory of Colorado should be submitted to the people of the said Territory in the month of July, 1876, for ratification or rejection, and the returns of said election should be made to the acting governor of the Territory, who with the chief-justice and United States attorney of said Territory should canvass the same, and if a majority of legal votes should be cast for said constitution and if a majority of regar votes should be east for said constitution in said proposed State, the said acting governor should certify the same to the President of the United States, with a copy of said constitution, "whereupon, it should be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress."

Now, what was done by Congress in this act? It authorized the people of the Territory of Colorado to say whether they would or would not become a State of the Union. It authorized the acting govwould not become a State of the Union. It authorized the acting governor of the Territory, who is instructed with the chief-justice and United States attorney of the Territory to canvass the votes, to make a return of the fact whether the people of the Territory have agreed to it or not to the President of the United States, and upon that fact alone the President is to issue his proclamation—not that the conditions have been complied with, for the President cannot perform that duty in pursuance of any power that is given to him by the terms of the act, but being notified that the people of the Territory of Colorado have agreed to become a member of the Union according to the rado have agreed to become a member of the Union according to the conditions prescribed, he makes, as he is instructed and required to do, a proclamation of that fact, and thus the State of Colorado is a State of the Union upon an equal footing with the original States. That is all there is of it.

Is there any delegation of legislative power to the President by Congress in the act? Is it a legislative act when the President receives the certificate of the election, issues his proclamation thereupon that Colorado is a State of the Union? Who says that it is legislation? No, sir, it is an executive act performed in obedience to the explicit instructions of the legislative department of the Government; an act necessary to the execution of the law for the admission of Colorado to the Union, in pursuance of the action of Congress and the people of the Territory. It has not the spirit nor the semblance of legislative power.

In the action of the Government for the admission of States to the Union in the first half of this century, the case which most nearly resembles this is that of Indiana, which was admitted to the Union in 1817. As I understand the history of that State, the ground upon which the admission of Indiana to the Union was disputed was that there had been no proclamation either of Congress or of the President of the United States that she was a State of the Union. That was the only alleged defect. Everything else was regular and complete. But the Senate did not so regard it; the House of Representatives did not regard even the proclamation as indispensable to her admission to the Union. Indiana was a State. She had virtually, so far as she could, complied with the conditions of her admission, and therefore they not only received the Senators elected from that State, but they received the electoral vote of that State. The only fact but they received the electoral vote of that State. The only fact wanting, so far as I remember the case of Indiana, was that the President had not issued a proclamation declaring the State into the Union. There is no such lapse here; everything is complete; everything necessary on the part of Congress has been completed. The people of the State have had a proper election authorized by Congress, have declared by a vote of the people that they desire to become a State of the Union. The governor and the canvassing officers of the new State, in obedience to the law of Congress, made known to the President of the United States that an election has been held, and that the people had decided in favor of the adoption of the constitution and of her admission into the Union. All the conditions prescribed by the law have been complied with, and the President, in obedience to the law of Congress, has issued his proclamation that Colorado is now a State of the Union.

Now I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio if there is in this action of the people, or the executive department of the Government, any possible derogation of the legislative authority or power? There is none whatever. That, it appears to me, is substantially the spirit and substance, the bone and marrow of this question. These fundamental conditions which were embodied in the act authorizing Colorado to form a State government are perpetual conditions; that is, it is wholly immaterial whether or not Congress shall now decide that the State has or has not complied with them. The conditions are as enduring as the State itself, and it can never avoid, evade, or escape them. The truth is that in regard to this matter there was no delegation of authority—none whatever. The President has performed the simplest executive ministerial act possible for him to perform. It was an act necessary to make known to the country that Colorado had complied with the law of Congress as far as necessary, and that she had consented to come into the Union as one of the States of the Union.

Now there are innumerable instances of this kind of legislation on record and of executive acts of this description. Let us take for example the case of a treaty made by the treaty-making power with a foreign government. It cannot go into effect until certain legislative acts have been passed by the appropriate legislative power. Those acts are legislative in their character but they are indispensable for the execution of the treaty, they are therefore executive not legislative acts, so far as the treaty powers are concerned. The action of the Legislature in performing its duty is merely that of executing the law or treaty, the treaty having been agreed upon between the nations. The negotiation of the treaty is no part of the duty of the Legislature, but the execution of the treaty by legislation is an indispensable duty. In the several States it is a common occurrence, that legislatures anthonize for instance a country site to be established but pensable duty. In the several States it is a common occurrence, that Legislatures authorize for instance a county site to be established, but do not indicate the spot where it shall be established; that matter is left to the people of the county, they must put into execution the law by selecting the site. So in this instance, the President was required to issue his proclamation so as to inform the people that the State of Colorado had agreed to enter the Union, and there is no power given to Congress to go behind that proclamation.

Mr. SOUTHARD addressed the House, and after proceeding some time was interpreted by:

Of course I supposed that only three hours would be consumed before the previous question was called; and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] used up an hour of the time when having his report read.

Mr. SOUTHARD resumed, and concluded his remarks, as follows:
Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, the question before us relates to the right of Mr. Belford to a seat on this floor as a Representative in Congress from the State of Colorado. There is no objection made to the manner of conducting or certifying his election, and the only inquiry is whether Colorado has been duly admitted as a State into the Union.

Under the articles of confederation "no other class" the Constitution of the content of

Under the articles of confederation "no other colony" than Canada could be admitted into the Union without the consent of nine States. could be admitted into the Union without the consent of nine States. But a vast extent of unoccupied territory then existed which did not properly fall under the designation of "colony," about which no provision had been made, and which was eventually to become the seat of great wealth and population. At the close of the war for independence, this territory was claimed by the States, but at length its cession by the States to the Union was agreed upon, and it thus became the common property of the people of all the States. The cession of a large part of this territory was made before the adoption of the Constitution, and the convention which framed that instrument foresaw the necessity of providing some method by which new and independent the necessity of providing some method by which new and independent States should be organized and admitted into the Union. The provision adopted is found in the fourth article, third section, of the Constitution, as follows:

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or part of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

Whether this provision is the wisest and best that could have been devised is no part of our inquiry, although it is difficult to see where else so important a prerogative could have been more safely lodged. But however this may be, it is that which has been transmitted to us, and we are concerned alone in its proper administration.

It will be observed that there are two distinct branches of this pro-The first relates to the formation of new States from territory wholly without the limits of any State, and the second to the formation or erection of new States from territory included within formation or erection of new States from territory included within the limits of one or more existing States. In the first, Congress alone is to be consulted, and in the second the consent of the States concerned is required as well as that of Congress.

The manner of the exercise of this power of Congress is through a legislative act. And while there is no particular formula prescribed, it is clear that the act must be in conformity with those principles which are recognized by legal and judicial interpretation to be necessary to a valid legislative act.

If the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form

If the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875, is such an act, then Colorado is a State in this Union and Mr. Belford is entitled to his seat. If, however, the act is not of this character, but requires the further action of Congress to make it complete, then Colorado is not yet a State in the Union and Mr. Belford cannot be entitled to his seat until such time as Congress has taken this further and final action.

But I submit that the act is not a valid legislative act, for the rea-But I submit that the act is not a valid legislative act, for the reason that it undertakes to delegate legislative authority, an exercise of power clearly prohibited by the Constitution. It declares that several very important conditions shall be complied with in the formation of the constitution and State government precedent to its right to admission into the Union, and delegates to the President of the United States the right to judge whether these conditions have been fulfilled.

The fourth section of the act provides among other things that the constitution shall be republican in form; that it shall make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color; that it shall not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States or to the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

The same section further declares that the constitutional conven-

The same section further declares that the constitutional convention shall provide by ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured; that the people of said Territory forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory; that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; that the lands of non-residents of said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands of the residents thereof; and that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein now owned or hereafter to be ac-State on lands or property therein now owned or hereafter to be acquired by the United States.

All these conditions and others not necessary to enumerate, relating to the rights of property and to the personal rights and liberties of the people, are required by the terms of the enabling act to be embodied into the constitution and ordinances as express conditions, upon which alone the State shall be entitled to admission into the Union. The judgment necessary to determine these questions belongs exclusively to Congress.

Judge Cooley, in his able treatise on Constitutional Limitations, page 30, says:

There are always in these cases questions of policy as well as of constitutional law to be determined by the Congress before admission becomes a matter of right—whether the constitution formed is republican; whether the proper State boundaries have been fixed upon; whether the population is sufficient; whether the proper qualifications for the exercise of the elective franchise have been agreed to; whether any inveterate evil exists in the Territory which is now subject to control, but which might be perpetuated under a State government—these and the like questions in which the whole-country is interested cannot be finally solved by the people of the Territory for themselves, but the final decision must rest with Congress, and the judgment must be favorable before admission can be claimed or expected.

The Constitution of the United States, article 4, section 4, requires that

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

There is a necessity, therefore, that Congress shall demand as a prerequisite to the admission of a new State that it shall have a government republican in form. Mr. Madison, in the Federalist, has

But the authority extends no further than a guarantee of a republican form of government, which supposes a pre-existing government of the form which is to be guaranteed.

And the reasons for this provision he sums up in the following apt language:

language:

In a confederacy founded on republican principles and composed of republican members, the superintending government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchical innovations. The more intimate the nature of such a union may be, the greater interest have the members in the political institutions of each other, and the greater right to insist that the forms of government under which the compact was entered into should be substantially maintained. * * Governments of dissimilar principles and forms have been found less adapted to a federal coalition of any sort than those of a kindred nature, "as the confederate republic of Germany," says Montesquieu, "consists of free cities and petty states, subject to different princes, experience shows us that it is more imperfect than that of Holland or Switzerland." "Greece was undone," he adds, "as soon as the king of Macedon obtained a seat among the Amphictyons." In the latter case, no doubt, the disproportionate force as well as the monarchical form of the new confederate had its share of influence on the events.

What a manifest abuse of authority it would be in Congress to ad-

What a manifest abuse of authority it would be in Congress to admit a State to membership in the Federal Union with a constitution not republican in form, which it would be required under the Constition to proceed to change immediately thereafter! And if the Senators and Representatives are first to be admitted, their voice and intors and Representatives are first to be admitted, their voice and influence would be added to the power that might oppose the needful change. It can scarcely be expected that Congress would do so unreasonable a thing. But this is only one of the many conditions expressed in the enabling act, all of which are highly important. If Congress cannot now pass upon the constitution of Colorado, as it has been formed and ratified, but must be bound by the result whether it accords or not with the terms and conditions prescribed in the enabling act, then it is perfectly clear that it has divested itself of the authority conferred upon it by the Constitution, and rendered itself powerless to enforce a compliance with those conditions which it has declared to be necessary. But this is precisely what this act undertakes to do. takes to do.

The fifth section of the enabling act provides-

That in case the constitution and State government shall be formed for the people of Colorado in compliance with the provisions of this act, said convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said State.

It further provides that in case the people, by a majority vote, ratify the said constitution—

The acting governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, to ether with a copy of said constitution and ordinances; whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

If it is important to prescribe these conditions, it is certainly of equal importance to have them complied with, and the authority, judgment, and discretion requisite to determine these questions is a part of the duty devolved upon Congress by the Constitution which it cannot confer upon any other person or body.

In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 116, we find this doctrine laid down:

One of the settled maxims in constitutional law is, that the power conferred upon the Legislature to make laws cannot be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority, there it must remain; and by the constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the constitution itself is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been intrusted cannot relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be devolved, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confer this sovereign trust.

In Railroad Company vs. Commissioners of Clinton County, 1 Ohio State, 87, Justice Ranney said:

That the General Assembly cannot surrender any portion of the legislative authority with which it is invested, or authorize its exercise by any other person or body, is a proposition too clear for argument.

In Rice vs. Foster, 4 Harr., 489, the court say:

It is a plain proposition of law that a power or authority vested in one or more persons to act for others, involving in its exercise judgment and discretion, is a trust and confidence reposed in the party, which cannot be transferred or delegated.

From this doctrine there has been no dissent in any of the courts, State or Federal, so far as I have been able to examine, and whatever diversity of judicial decision there has been has arisen from the application of the principle to the particular cases, and not from any disagreement about the principle itself. The decisions affirming this position are so universal that it is not necessary that further references be made to them. Whenever, therefore, the Legislature attempts to delegate the authority reposed in it, it transcends its powers and its action becomes void. What, then, is and what is not a delegation of such authority? This I can best illustrate, perhaps, by reference to some authorities.

It is not denied that conditional statutes, and those made to take effect upon the happening of some future event; may be enacted. But these do not infringe upon this maxim. Nor do those statutes creating corporations, which leave it to the corporators to say whether they will accept of the franchise. Judge Cooley says:

In these cases the legislative act is regarded as complete when it has passed through the constitutional formalities necessary to perfected legislation, notwithstanding its actually going into operation as law may depend upon its subsequent acceptance.

It is claimed that this enabling act is what may be termed a conditional act—one made to take effect upon the happening of an event—the event being the compliance with the conditions therein

The answer to this is, that the event is not such a one as the act can be made to depend upon. In this view I call attention to the references which I shall now make.

In Ex parte Wall, 48 California, 279, the court say:

A statute to take effect upon a subsequent event, when it comes from the hands of the Legislature, must be a law in present to take effect in future. On the question of the expediency of the law, the Legislature must exercise its own judgment definitively and finally. If it can be made to take effect on the occurrence of an event, the Legislature must declare the law expedient if the event shall happen, but inexpedient if it shall not happen. They can appeal to no other man or men to judge for them in relation to its present or future propriety or necessity; they must exercise that power themselves, and thus perform the duty imposed upon them by the Constitution.

The law in question was one authorizing a license for the sale of intoxicating liquors in any township of the State, in the event that the people of the township, by a majority vote, should so decide; and the court held the law void on the ground that the expediency of the law must rest with the Legislature and not with the people

In the case of Barto vs. Himrod, 8 New York, (4 Selden,) 490, the ourt say:

It is not denied that a valid statute may be passed, to take effect upon the hap-pening of some future event, certain or uncertain. But such a statute when it comes from the hands of the Legislature must be law in present to take effect in

The event here referred to was a majority vote of the people of the State in favor of a free-school act. And the court further say:

The wisdom or expediency of the free-school act, abstractly considered, did not depend on the vote of the people. If it was unwise or inexpedient before that vote was taken, it was equally so afterward. The event on which the act was made to take effect was nothing else than the vote of the people on the identical question which the constitution makes it the duty of the Legislature itself to decide. The Legislature has no power to make a statute dependent on such a contingency, because it would be confiding to others that legislative discretion which they are bound to exercise themselves, and which they cannot commit to any other man or men to be exercised.

Justice Ranney, in the case before referred to, (1 O. St., 87,) while asserting so unequivocally that legislative authority could not be delegated, still maintained that it was within the constitutional powers of the Legislature to enact a law contingent upon the happening of an event or subject to the intervening assent of other persons, and as a test of what was permissible, laid down this rule:

The true distinction, therefore, is between the delegation of power to make law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring an authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first cannot be done; to the latterno valid objection can be made.

In Santo vs. Iowa, 2 Iowa, 203, it is said:

* * There is no doubt of the authority of the Legislature to pass an act to take effect upon a contingency. But what is a contingency in this sense and connection? It is some event independent of the will of the law-making power as exercised in making the law, or some event over which the Legislature has exercised in making the law, or some event over which the Legislature has not control.

* * The will of the law-maker is not a contingency in relation to himself. It may be made in relation to another and external power, but to call it so in relation to himself is an abuse of language. Now, if the people are to say whether or not an act shall become a law, they become or are put in the place of the law-maker. And here is the constitutional objection. Their will is not a contingency upon which certain things are or are not to be done under the law, but it becomes the determining power whether such be the law or not. This makes them the legislative authority, which, by the constitution, is vested in the senate and house of representatives, and not the people.

The contingency referred to was the approval of the people of the State, by vote, of an act for the suppression of intemperance.

And in Bradley vs. Baxter (15 Barb., 123) we find the like doctrine:

And in Bradley vs. Baxter (15 Barb., 125) we find the like doctrine:

It is insisted, and was strenuously urged upon the argument, that the Legislature has power to enact conditional laws, laws to take effect upon the happening of some future and contingent event. Nobody will contest this proposition. * *

But in none of these cases was the act of the Legislature made to take effect upon any decision of this foreign or extraneous power upon the expediency of the act itself. These laws were to take effect upon the happening of certain events which would, in the opinion of the legislative or law-making power, render such a law expedient and proper for such a state of things. The circumstances, to meet which such laws were enacted, were contingent and uncertain; but the laws themselves expressed the deliberate will of the law-making power, provided the circumstances should happen to which the laws were intended to apply.

The court say, in Ex parte Wall, 48 California Reports, 314:

It is true a statute may be conditional; its taking effect may sometimes be made to depend upon a subsequent event. The last proposition is illustrated by The Brig

Aurora vs. The United States, 7 Cranch, 382, in which the validity of a provision of the "non-intercourse law" was upheld. The provision was to the effect that in case Great Britain or France should revoke or modify its edicts previously issued, so that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the trade suspended by the law should be renewed. It will be observed that in this instance the members of Congress exercised their own judgment, and simply determined that trade should be suspended while the orders in council or edict should continue.

From the authorities the following formulas are adduced: (1.) That From the authorities the following formulas are addited: (1.) That legislative power or authority cannot be delegated; (2) that while conditional statutes may be enacted, so as to go into effect upon the happening of some future event, it is not every event upon which the statute may be made to depend; (3) that the event or condition must be such as is independent of the law-making power, sutside of and beyond the legislative will and discretion; (4) that it must operate upon the execution or suspension of the law, and not upon its execution. its creation.

Applying these tests to the enabling act under consideration, we find that it falls within the prohibitions laid down. The elements of the event are the elements of the very law that Congress is empowered to pass, and operate upon its creation, and not upon its execu-

To ascertain the qualifications necessary for admission is the very duty which Congress is called upon to perform. The act in question cannot be held to be one which is complete and perfect in itself as it left the hands of the Legislature and only requiring the happening of an event to put it into operation; nor one in which the Legislature has rightfully declared the law expedient if the event shall happen, and inexpedient if it shall not happen. To make such a statute valid the authorities all agree that the event must be one independent of the legislative power, otherwise the condition fails and the law is void. In the present case the event depends directly upon the legislative power. The one cannot be separated from the other. The determination of the very existence of the event itself brings into operation those legislative faculties and functions which are involved in ascertaining the qualifications of the new State for admission. To ascertain the qualifications necessary for admission is the very ation those legislative faculties and functions which are involved in ascertaining the qualifications of the new State for admission.

The thing to be done is to admit the State; to admit the State, in the solemn judgment of Congress, certain conditions should be first complied with as a necessary qualification; to determine whether these conditions have been complied with, or, what is the same thing, whether the event has happened, is nothing more nor less than to determine whether the new State is entitled to admission—a conclusion which rests exclusively with Congress

The act, therefore, does not admit the State, and cannot do more than project a plan for its admission. Thus far it is very appropriate, but no farther.

The projection of a plan may be very well in the first instance, but the important thing to know, and decide finally, is whether the plan has been adopted.

In Permoli vs. First Municipality, 3 Howard, 609, the court say in relation to the enabling act, and the act of admission of the State of

That act of February 20, 1811, authorized the people of the Territory of Orleans to form aconstitution and State government. By section 3 certain restrictions were imposed in the form of instructions to the convention that might form the constitution; such as that it should be republican in form; consistent with the Constitution of the United States; that it should secure the right of trial by jury in criminal cases, and the writ of habeas corpus; that the laws of the State should be published and legislative and judicial proceedings be written and recorded in the language of the Constitution of the United States. * *

By the act of April 8, 1812, Louisiana was admitted according to the mode prescribed by the act of 1811. Congress declared that it should be on the conditions and terms contained in the third section of that act, which should be considered, deemed, and taken as fundamental conditions and terms upon which the State was incorporated in the Union.

All Congress intended was to declare in advance to the people of the Territory the fundamental principles their constitution should contain. This was every way proper under the circumstances. The instrument having been duly formed and presented, it was for the National Legislature to judge whether it contained the proper principles, and to accept it if it did, or reject it if it did not. Having accepted the constitution and admitted the State "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever," in express terms, by the act of 1812, Congress as concluded from assuming that the instructions contained in the act of 1811 lad not been complied with.

But the Louisiana enabling act was as complete and perfect in every

But the Louisiana enabling act was as complete and perfect in every respect as the Colorado enabling act, with the single exception of that part which, in case of a majority vote of the people in favor of the constitution, requires the acting governor to "certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances," and makes it "the duty of the President to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress." tion whatever on the part of Congress."

If we are to construe this act in accordance with its terms, then until the President has seen fit to issue his proclamation the State of Colorado must be deemed and held not to be admitted into the Union. If this be a correct interpretation of the act, it is clear that the Pres-It has be a correct interpretation of the act, it is clear that the President of the United States, and not Congress, admits the State into the Union; for he is made the judge of the sufficiency of the Constitution and ordinances. Suppose he withholds his proclamation? In that event the State either is not admitted, or, if admitted, it must be by force of other provisions of the law, and the proclamation must be treated as a work of supercrogation. And this seems to be the position taken by the committee in their report. They say:

Assuming that the people of Colorado had in point of fact performed in good faith every condition prescribed in the act in strict conformity with its provisions, the present Congress would be bound in good morals to recognize them as a State and admit them to representation in the Senate and House, even if the President had willfully refused to issue the proclamation provided for, and the only possible pretext for a failure upon the part of Congress to discharge its solemn obligation in that regard would be found in the quibble that the people of Colorado had agreed that their admission should depend finally upon the issual of a proclamation willfully withheld without any fault upon their part, and after they had religiously observed and performed every obligation resting upon them.

In the estimation, therefore, of the committee, the proclamation of the President is not held to be necessary to perfect the admission of the State into the Union. But this conclusion does not relieve the question of its difficulty. It is just as objectionable, and just as much in conflict with the authorities upon the subject, to delegate the power to the people of the Territory as to delegate it to the President of the United States. It follows as a matter of course from this view that if the President's proclamation is unnecessary, that that portion of the enabling act which relates to certifying the vote, together with the constitution and ordinances to the President, and for the issuing of his proclamation, is to be treated as a dead letter, and the act would be the same in effect if it were stricken out. But strike out that portion, and we have left an enabling act, pure and simple, such as it has been the practice of Congress to adopt for more than half a century. And in none of the cases of this character has Congress accepted the doctrine that the State was actually admitted Congress accepted the doctrine that the State was actually admitted into the Union at the time the people of the Territory had adopted a constitution in accordance with the terms of the enabling act. But Congress, on the contrary, has dissented from this position in every instance in which the question has been made. It was rejected by Congress after the fullest consideration upon the admission of Missouri and later upon the admission of Michigan, and the question may be regarded as settled so far as the force of legislative precedent can settled.

But the assumption of the committee in their report, as a condition upon which the Territory is entitled to admission as a State, that "the people of Colorado had in point of fact performed in good faith every condition prescribed" in the enabling act, is an implied admission that, if they had not so performed, Congress would not be "bound in good morals" or otherwise to recognize them as a State. What more cogent reason could there be of the necessity of an examination into the constitution to ascertain whether, in point of fact, it had been framed in accordance with the conditions imposed? If it is only upon this assumption that the State is to be recognized, then it follows from the force of irresistible logic that this examination becomes an imperative necessity.

And the question recurs, Who is to make this examination? Manifestly Congress, and not the President or the people of the Territory. But the committee say, in such case Congress would be bound in good morals to recognize them as a State and admit them to representation, &c.

"Bound in good morals" is a very different thing from being bound under the Constitution and laws. Furthermore, "bound in good morals" to do a certain act upon the assumption or ascertainment of certain facts, is a very different thing from doing that act without the ascertainment of these facts. I may admit, for the sake of the argument, that, if upon examination of the Constitution as formed, it is found to be in accordance with the terms of the enabling act, Congress would be "bound in good morals" as well as in public faith and justice to the people of Colorado to ratify the work thus performed; but this admission does not require of me that I must therefore maintain that Colorado has been admitted by what has already transpired, or that the State, as a matter of constitutional and legal right, became a member of the Federal Union either at the date of the adoption of the constitution by the people or at the time of the issuing of the President's proclamation.

Our judgment of the constitutional and legal effect of what has already been done in no just sense can be likened to what our action ought now or hereafter to be in consequence of what has transpired. We may, indeed, with entire consistency, have an honest conviction that the State is not now admitted, and an equally honest conviction that it ought "in good morals" to be hereafter admitted by the further legislative sanction of Congress.

And if I understand the minority of the committee, this is precisely what they propose to do. Believing upon full examination of the constitution and ordinances of Colorado as they have been formed and ratified that they are in substantial compliance with the terms of the enabling act, and such in their character as should entitle the State to admission, they propose by the bill, which they present to Congress for its a doption, to admit the State "on an equal footing with the original States." And while I was originally opposed to the admission of the State, now that the people have formed for themselves a State government on the faith of the enabling act, and in harmony with the Constitution of the United States, I feel like giving the work my sanction and voting for the bill presented.

The view which I have taken is in substantial harmony with the long line of precedents, with the single exception of that of Nevada, which was in the midst of civil war, when constitutional restraints were very much weakened. And if this precedent is now to be followed it will verify the exclamation of Calhoun: "Let it be remembered that myder our system had accordant him." bered that under our system bad precedents live forever; good ones

In this connection I would commend to attention the warning words of the court in the case of Parker vs. Commonwealth, 6 Barr.,

A bad precedent suffered to pass sub silentic cannot be set up to justify the continuance of an abuse in which it originated. This is especially true where the question is of the constitutional exertion of a delegated power. A different rule would expose the fundamental laws of the State to continual danger of subversion from a succession of encroachments which in the beginning did not attract the public attention or invite its investigation; a consequence too momentous to be hazarded by unreasonable deference to tolerated mistakes.

Now what are the precedents?

Now what are the precedents? The first case is that of Vermont, which State it is claimed was admitted into the Union without any enabling act and without Congress having examined and approved her constitution. This distinction must be observed: the question was not the formation of a new State, but the admission of a State that was in esse, a State that had had a State government for years. The only question in the case of Vermont was whether the State government that then existed should adopt the Constitution of the United States, and thus qualify itself for admission into the Union.

There was a dispute between the State of New York and Vermont

There was a dispute between the State of New York and Vermont over the western boundary of Vermont, which under the Constitu-tion required the action of the Legislature of New York to give its assent to the proposed admission of the State of Vermont if the claim of New York were valid.

I have said that at the time of the admission of Vermont she was a State in existence. I find in Thompson's History of Vermont this statement in relation to the royal decision in 1764, by which it was attempted to place her under the jurisdiction of New York:

Regarding herself as placed by that decision in a state of nature, her citizens had formed themselves into a body politic, into a little independent republic for their nutual benefit and defense, and by the boldness, the wisdom, and the prudence of her statesmen she had succeeded in organizing an efficient government for the regulation of her internal affairs, and had adopted a system of jurisprudence fully adequate to the necessities of the people.

At the time Vermont became a member of the Confederacy, her own government had become systematic and stable by the practical experience of thirteen years, and that of the United States had been placed upon the foundation of its present Constitution.

Before the act for the admission of Vermont was adopted the President of the United States laid before Congress the legislative act of dent of the United States laid before Congress the legislative act of New York granting her consent to the admission of Vermont and the legislative act of the State of Vermont giving the assent of her people to the terms and conditions prescribed on the part of the State of New York, adopting the Constitution of the United States and praying admission of Congress. The thing that was done on the part of the State of Vermont was to adopt the Constitution of the United States and agree to terms impossed by New York. Here is the United States and agree to terms imposed by New York. Here is the closing section of the act of her Legislature:

It is hereby further enacted by the authority aforesaid. That the persons so elected to serve in the State convention as aforesaid do assemble and meet together on the first Thursday of January next, at Bennington, in the county of Bennington, then and there to deliberate upon the aforesaid Constitution of the United States, and, if approved of by them, finally to assent to and ratify the same, in behalf and on the part of the people of this State, and make report thereof to the governor of this State, for the time being, to be by him communicated to the President of the United States and the Legislature of this State.

So Vermont at that time was a State, and her Legislature gave the consent of that State to her admission into the Union and ratified the Constitution of the United States, and it was not a question of the formation of a State constitution. They had their State govern-ment, and it was not for years after that they formed a State constiment, and it was not for years after that they formed a State constitution. Vermont was admitted into the Union by act of Congress February 18, 1791, and her Senators and Members of Congress were not admitted to their seats until October 13, 1791.

The next case is that of Kentucky. It is said that Kentucky was admitted in a manner similar to this. Kentucky was erected out of the territory of the State of Virginia. The State of Virginia had the right and the authority to creet a State out of her territory, and only required the assent of Congress that the State so creeted might become a State in the Union. The terms and conditions were prescribed by an act of the Virginia Legislature, and those terms and conditions were ratified by the people of Kentucky in convention assembled. All the proceedings were laid before Congress by the President of the United States before the act of assent was given by Congress.

But more than that, the day fixed for admission was June 2, 1792. Before that time had arrived the people had formed their constitution, which had been laid before Congress, as is shown by House Journal, volume 1, page 614; and before the member was admitted to this floor the constitution had been placed in the possession of Congress. So that Congress actually had made the examination of the constitution that was necessary to determine whether Kentucky was a State, in full compliance with such terms and conditions as ought to entitle a State to admission into the Union.

In reference to this question, I beg leave to read from 8 Wheaton,

Now, it is perfectly clear that, although Congress might have refused their consent to the proposed separation, yet they had no authority to declare Kentucky a separate and independent State without the assent of Virginia or upon terms variant from those which Virginia had prescribed. But Congress, after recognizing the conditions upon which alone Virginia agreed to the separation, expressed by a solemn act the consent of that body to the separation.

The terms and conditions therefore were prescribed by the State of Virginia, and Congress assented with full information, with full knowledge of what had been done, and in strict accordance with the provision of the Constitution relating to erection of new States out of territory within an existing State. In the case of Colorado the constitution has never been laid before either branch of Congress. The President's proclamation does not pretend to transmit here the constitution or ordinances of the State of Colorado.

The next ease sited as a precedent against the doctrine of the mineral constitution of the mine

The next case cited as a precedent against the doctrine of the minority report in this case is that of Ohio. But, sir, before any Member or Senator was admitted to his seat the constitution was laid before Congress. It was|duly referred to a committee; it was reported by them to be in compliance with the terms and conditions of the enabling act; and not until the next year thereafter was the member sworn in here or Senators in the other branch, as appears from House Journal, volume 4, page 403. On the 17th of December, 1803, the member from that State took his seat; on a later day the Senators were seated; but the constitution as formed was laid before Congress, and due action was had upon it; Congress passed upon the sufficiency of its provisions. So that the case is directly in point in favor of this minority report in principle, although no further act of ratification was placed upon

The next case is that of Louisiana, which formed its constitution in strict compliance with the enabling act, and a subsequent act of ratification was deemed necessary and adopted. From that day down to the present there has been no single instance except that of Nevada in which a State has been admitted into the Union until the constitution had first been laid before Congress and its provisions passed upon. In all these cases, except Nevada, the mode has either been by an enabling act and a subsequent act of ratification, or by been by an enabling act and a subsequent act of ratification, or by the submission of the constitution and ordinances previously formed by the voluntary action of the people.

Indiana also is cited as a case in point against the position I have taken. But I beg the attention of the House for a moment to this case. A constitution was formed for the State of Indiana, and on the 6th day of November, 1817, the Representative presented himself and was sworn in; but the Senators who also presented themselves were not sworn, because objection was taken and the point made that the State was not duly admitted. The case was therefore similar to that State was not duly admitted. The case was, therefore, similar to that presented to-day with regard to Colorado, the Senators having been sworn in but the admission of the Representative being objected to. Subsequently the Senate, after mature deliberation, passed an act ratifying the work of the convention of Indiana; ratifying the conratifying the work of the convention of Indiana; ratifying the constitution as it had been formed and transmitted to Congress; and so consistent did the Honse deem this proceeding with what was necessary to be done to perfect the admission of the State, that it, notwithstanding it had seated the member, concurred in that act, and on the 11th of December it was approved by the President. Thus, notwithstanding the member had been sworn in, the House saw fit to pass a subsequent act ratifying the work which had been done. When it came to counting the electoral vote from Indiana the House objected, and the two Houses separated. After some discussion in the House is and the two Houses separated. After some discussion in the House it was resolved to postpone the question, not to decide it; and there-upon the two Houses met and the vote was counted. But subse-quently, in the case of Missouri, in 1821, the vote was not counted; and in the case of Michigan, in 1837, the vote was not counted, except hypothetically; and that was a practical rejection of the vote to all intents and purposes.

I want to call attention now to another feature in the case of Missouri. It is said that Congress, after examining the constitution and ordinances, required a further condition, which was submitted to the Legislature for ratification; that this fact was certified to the President, and upon his proclamation admission became complete. A distinction and upon his proclamation admission became complete. A distriction is here to be observed. The condition which Congress prescribed was set out in have verba, and all that the Legislature was required to do was simply to sanction the specific condition by solemn act and to confirm that work of Congress. The State was not called upon to enact any provision, but simply to accept one specifically set forth by Congress; and the confirmation of that fact to the President was simply the confident ice of an event which was legitimate and proper but Congress; and the certification of that fact to the President was simply the certification of an event, which was legitimate and proper, but by no means a parallel with the present case. It would be parallel with this case only upon the supposition that Congress had actually formed the constitution and ordinances of Colorado complete and perfect in all their provisions, submitted them to the people for their ratification by solemn act of convention, such ratification to be certified to the President, and that fact to be by him made known by proclamation. That would be a parallel, but nothing less than that would be a parallel.

The case of Missouri, therefore, shows that Congress assumed the right to exercise its independ upon the work done by the convention right to exercise its judgment upon the work done by the convention in forming the constitution of Missouri. The same may be said of Nebraska. After the enabling act Congress examined the constitution as formed, and required a further condition should be complied with, and Congress set out the condition specifically, not in general terms, but specifically what the Legislature of Nebraska was required to do, and that ratification was to be transmitted to the President and he on certification of the ratification of the condition fixed by Congress was to issue his proclamation. In the exercise of the legislative discretion on the part of Congress it was required to determine whether a constitution had been adopted republican in form, whether it had been adopted in accordance with the principles of the Declaration of Independence, whether it had been adopted in accordance with the terms and conditions set out in the enabling act. All these had been previously passed upon by Congress in the admission of Nebraska, and the fact to be certified was similar to that in the case of Missouri.

The same may be said in reference to West Virginia, but I need not pursue this feature any further.

Mr. Speaker, in no single instance has Congress ever admitted a State except it has passed upon the work of the constitutional convention, unless it has passed upon the constitution framed for the State government, since 1812, when Louisiana was admitted, save and except Nevada alone. In every other instance the work has been required to be laid before Congress and its approval had been obtained before the State was held to be actually admitted into the Union and entitled to the privilege of Senators upon the floor of the Senate or to a Representative upon the floor of this House. Congress has seen fit to prescribe that legal mode, and it is one consistent with reason and the precedents and practice of the country since 1812 down to and the precedents and practice of the country since 1812 down to the present hour.

Now, if we are to admit a State in the way proposed in the case of Colorado, Congress cannot be the judge of its conditions and qualifications. Suppose, for instance, Colorado in her constitution had provided that no man should be eligible to be governor unless he had an income of $50,000 a year, and did not have to come to Congress for ratification of that constitution. Not a member in the House would have voted for its ratification and admission, not a member but would have voted for its ratification and admission, not a member but would have voted to reject it, and yet it is republican in member but would have voted to reject it, and yet it is republican in form. Publicists and political writers would say it is republican in form. But if the State is actually admitted the remedy is lost, and the evil might continue to exist. What is to be done is to determine the work after it is complete, that Congress may rationally, intelligently, constitutionally pass upon it, thereby preserving the harmony of the Federal Union and the equality of the States.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR TO-MORROW.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table a concurrent resolution of the Senate for action at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

was read, as 10110wo.
In the Senate of the United States,

January 31, 1877.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That during the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, no persons besides those who now have the privilege of the floor of the House of Representatives shall be admitted to the south wing of the Capitol extension, except upon tickets to be is sued by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatatives; to be issued to Senators and Representatives and others, and shall be distributed by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and House of Representatives. GEO. C. GORHAM.

Mr. COX. I move concurrence in that resolution. The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution as concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I wish to state to members of the House, by way of notification, that the tickets of admission are now being printed and will be at the Sergeant-at-Arms' office as soon as they can be brought here; but if they do not come here in time to be handed to members before the adjournment they will be sent in the mail of members this evening.

COLORADO.

Mr. KNOTT. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the position assumed by the minority in this case is that Colorado has never been admitted into this Union as one of the States thereof. The reason assigned is that by the Constitution Congress alone can admit new States into the Union, and Congress has never admitted Colorado; therefore she is not one of the States of the Union. I admit that Congress alone can admit new States; but if it be true that Congress has never admitted Colorado, then Colorado is not one of the States of this Union.

rado, then Colorado is not one of the States of this Union.

The ground taken by the minority for their position is that although Congress by the act of March 3, 1875, agreed to admit Colorado as a State upon the performance by her of certain prescribed conditions, yet she was not admitted because Congress delegated the power of admitting her to the President of the United States and to the people of Colorado themselves; and that although the President exercised that power and the people exercised that power, still the act was null and void, and she still remains in a territorial condition. No member of this House can go farther than I do in maintaining that Congress cannot delegate the power of admitting States into the Union, and that to Congress alone belongs the power of admission: but I do not of this House can go farther than I do in maintaining that Congress cannot delegate the power of admitting States into the Union, and that to Congress alone belongs the power of admission; but I do not concede that the clause of the enabling act, which the minority of the committee maintain attempts to give the power of admission to the President of the United States, confers any such power upon him. I maintain that Congress by that provision has neither delegated nor attempted to delegate any power whatever to the President. The act provides, after the people of Colorado have complied with all its requirements, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the States of the admission as a State. When the Union upon an equal footing with the original States. This is the clause which it is claimed is a delegation of power to the President to admit Colorado into the Union. I hope to be able to show in a to admit Colorado into the Union. I hope to be able to show in a few brief words that no such construction can be placed upon this sentence, and that Congress has simply made use of the President as the means of making known the fact that Colorado had been raised to the dignity of one of the States of this Union.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Hurd] maintains that there is a delegation of power to the President and delegation of power to the people, but both of these propositions I deny.

No power whatever has been delegated to the President, but the duty of announcing a fact has been imposed upon him. No power has been delegated to the people of the Territory, because that people themselves possess the inherent power of acting upon the question of admission. When the Constitution says that Congress shall have the power to admit new States into this Union it necessarily implies that the new State itself has something to say upon that subject. The power to admit new States into this Union it necessarily implies that the new State itself has something to say upon that subject. The new State has a power to say whether she shall be admitted or not. The new State under the Constitution possesses this power. No one can say that the power to admit does not imply that the person to be admitted has not something to say about it. So that the Constitution itself preserves in the people of the Territory the power either to reject or to accept the proposition which Congress has made to it. Otherwise it can be said that the people of a Territory or of a State, when formed, can be forced into this Union under the Constitution. When formed, can be forced into this Union under the Constitution. No such power exists in the Constitution. But the power exists in the Constitution and by the Constitution that Congress shall admit and may admit new States into the Union, provided the new States are willing to be admitted. So that the proposition of the gentleman are willing to be admitted. So that the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is entirely illogical.

Again, he contends that the enabling act authorized the President to admit. This I shall show, as I have said, to be a fallacy. I maintain that the act of Congress provides that after the people of Colorado have complied with all requirements of the act it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into this Union.

Congress has adopted many and various modes of admitting new declaring the State admitted into this Union.

Congress has adopted many and various modes of admitting new States, and confines the process to no fixed and permanent rules. It may be done on the motion of the Territory desiring admission in the first instance, or by Congress first taking the initiatory steps. The Territory may without the previous knowledge or consent of Congress frame its constitution and present itself at the doors of Congress asking for admission and be admitted; also Congress may by enabling act present the question of admission to the Territory for its decision and point out what conditions precedent must be complied with to act present the question of admission to the Territory for its decision and point out what conditions precedent must be complied with to entitle her to be admitted; or, a Territory, without any previous steps being taken by Congress, may adopt a constitution and elect her Senators and Congressmen and send them here, and their admission by the two Houses of Congress would be an admission of her as a State in the Union, without any previous legislation thereon. The admission is complete whenever the mind of Congress and the mind of the Territory meet and agree upon the question of admission. Congress may then indicate any model it thinks fit of making the consumers. of the Territory meet and agree upon the question of admission. Congress may then indicate any mode it thinks fit of making the consumation of that agreement known to the other States of the Union and to the world. Congress may prescribe the means by which the Territory and itself shalf ascertain whether or not they agree upon the terms of admission, and in case such agreement is reached, it may prescribe some method by which the fact that such agreement has been reached shall be made public. It may make it the duty of the President of the United States upon the fact of such agreement heing made known to him to rublish information of the duty of the President of the United States upon the fact of such agreement being made known to him to publish information of the same in the public journals of the country. Can it be said that imposing such a duty would be a delegation of power to the President to admit the State into the Union? Is it any more than a duty devolved upon him to announce, declare, or proclaim that, by an agreement between Congress and the Territory, the Territory has been admitted as a State into the Union?

ment between Congress and the Territory, the Territory has been admitted as a State into the Union?

Supposing that Congress should pass an enabling act for the admission of Utah into the Union and in such act require that before she should be admitted she must by a vote of her people abolish polygamy within her limits; that the result of such vote should be made known to the President of the United States; that if the vote should be for the abolishment of polygamy the President should, "without any further act on the part of Congress," issue a proclamation announcing that the State was admitted into the Union; and if the vote were against its abolition he should issue his proclamation that the people had refused to abolish polygamy, and therefore the State was not admitted into the Union. Then suppose the vote when taken should be opposed to the abolition of polygamy and the President, as required, should announce by proclamation accordingly that the State was not admitted, will any member on this floor contend that Congress thereby vested the President with the power to keep Utah out of the Union, and President of the Senate by direction of both Houses, when they had met to count the votes for President and Vice-President, arose and declared that Andrew Jackson was elected President of the United States, did he by that declaration make or elect him to be President?

Did he not declare an already existing fact that Andrew Jackson had been elected President by the people of the United States? And when the President of the Senate, after having been so instructed by the House and Senate in joint session, shall arise in the presence of both these bodies and announce that by virtue of the authority vested in him by the two Houses he declares Samuel J. Tilden or R. B. Hayes the President of the United States from the 4th of March next, will the President of the Senate make the President, or will be declare who has already been made President by the votes of the people?

So when President Grant by the direction of Congress declared Colorado admitted into the Union he did not admit her into the Union, but by such announcement he declared an existing fact that she was admitted into the Union.

But supposition for the sake of argument that Congress in the

But supposing for the sake of argument that Congress in the case of Colorado, as it is charged, did intend to make a delegation of power to the President by which he was authorized to admit Colorado as a State into the Union by proclamation, she having first complied with all the terms of the enabling act, and that accordingly Colorado did comply with all the terms thus prescribed exactly and to the letter; now at this point arises the question, is the proclamation of the President necessary to admit her after she has complied with all the conditions-precedent required by Congress? The proclamation admitting her could not be required, because, Congress having no authority to make a grant of power, the grant was void, and any proclamation issued in pursuance thereof would be a nullity in law; its issuance therefore could have no binding effect in law, would be mere surplusage, and would have no further or greater force than simply to give notice to the world that the people of Colorado had done all that was necessary to make them a State in the Union. The rule is that was necessary to make them a state in the Union. The rule is that when two constructions can be given to a law, one sustaining the validity of the law and the other destroying it, that construction must be given which will sustain its validity in full force and effect, "ut magis valeat, quam periat." Nor will the law presume that the law-maker intended to enact a nullity, either ignorantly or designedly. If therefore the words of the enabling act in this instance—"whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States where the president of the United States where the president of the United States where the states where the states are the states and the states are the states and the states are the States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union"—are susceptible of two constructions, one of which would involve an illegal delegation of power to the President and make the words void and the other would simply devolve upon him the duty of publishing the fact to the world that Colorado was already a State in the Union, the latter construction must be adopted because it gives effect to the words of the law and does not destroy them. Therefore we are of necessity obliged to conclude that such was the intention of the law-makers; that is to say, that the compliance on the part of the people of Colorado with the terms prescribed by the enabling act should admit her into the Union without any further act on the part of Congress, and that the President should announce the fact of her admission by his proclamation.

But it is argued that Congress vested in the President the power of But it is argued that Congress vested in the President the power of deciding whether or not the constitution of Colorado was republican in form. This is an error. Let us see what Co gress did provide. It first authorized the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado to form for themselves a State government by the name of the "State of Colorado," and declared that such State when formed should be admitted into the Union. It provided further that delegates shall be elected to a convention to frame a constitution; then, when and where the delegates should meet; that they should first declare that they adopted the Constitution of the United States; that they should then form a constitution and State government, provided the constitution where the delegates should meet; that they should first declare that they adopted the Constitution of the United States; that they should then form a constitution and State government, provided the constitution should be republican in form, and when framed should be submitted to a vote of the people for ratification or rejection; that the returns of the votes should be made to the acting governor, who, with the chief-justice and United States attorney, should canvass the same; and, if a majority of the votes were for said constitution, the governor should certify the same to the President, together with a copy of said constitution. "Whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation," not admitting, but "declaring the State admitted into the Union;" and this he should do "without any further action on the part of Congress." Here it will be seen the "copy of the constitution" is not sent to him for revision or for the exercise of any judgment regarding it, but the result of the vote and the "copy of the constitution" are required to be sent to him only to notify him of the fact of its adoption, and that he might know that the time fixed by Congress had arrived for him to make his announcement, not that Colorado is hereby admitted into the Union, but declaring an already existing fact, that Colorado is admitted into the Union by having complied with the terms prescribed by Congress. No discretion, no duty to examine and decide upon the constitution is not set the President but the cases. No discretion, no duty to examine and decide upon the constitution is prescribed to the President, but the act says:

Upon the receipt of the result of the vote and a copy of the constitution it shall be his duty to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union, &c.

Supposing, after Colorado had done all that the enabling act resupposing, after Colorado had done all that the enabling act required of her to do, the President had not issued his proclamation, and her Senators and Member of Congress coming to Washington were admitted and sworn in as members, can any one say that Colorado would not thereby be admitted as a State into the Union, simply because the President had failed to perform his duty by not issuing his proclamation?

But it is further argued that one of the conditions-precedent required by the enabling act for the admission of Colorado was that she should frame and adopt a constitution republican in form, and that, therefore, Congress had to see that constitution and judge whether or not it was republican in form, before the State could be admitted. This might be a very wise precaution, but Congress has not in this case, as she has not in many others, seen fit to adopt it. The presumptions are all in favor of the republican form of her constitution. Congress presumed it would be republican. But should there be anything in her constitution inconsistent with a republican form of government, it would be a nullity, and would be of no more force and effect than if it were not in the constitution at all. That part of the constitution which would be republican in form would be the constitution of Colorado, and that portion of the document which would not be republican in form would be null and void and consequently no part of her constitution.

The judicial tribunals of her own creation and of the United States would be compelled so to decide. But the fact is her constitution is republican in form, and Colorado has therefore complied with the enabling act in this as in all other requirements made of her by Congress. No one charges that Colorado has not complied with all the terms of the enabling act required to be done by her before her admission into the Union. On the contrary, all that is admitted. If, then, the act required to be performed by the President was nugatory, as claimed by the minority, it had no effect, and the State was admitted without it.

I therefore maintain, in construing the clause making it the duty of the President to issue his proclamation declaring Colorado admitted into this Union, that this House cannot decide it to be unconstitutional. If any construction can be given to it which will make it constitutional, that construction must be given. In considering the question the following legal propositions must be kept in view: First, this Congress cannot presume that the last Congress in enacting said law intended to adopt an unconstitutional act. Second, we cannot presume that the last Congress ignorantly and unintentionally adopted an unconstitutional act. Third, the clause in question must be construed "ut magis valeat quam periat;" that it shall stand, and not fall by reason of its unconstitutionality.

In order that it shall not fall the simple, reasonable, and only construction which can be given to the clause is that it was intended simply to make it the duty of the President to issue a proclamation which should declare and announce the fact that Colorado, by reason of having complied with the terms of the enabling act, was by force of such compliance a State in the Union. Any other construction would make the clause unconstitutional; and such construction can-not by the rules of law be given to it, if the simple and reasonable construction for which I contend can be maintained. This is the only construction which can be given to it consistent with its constitu-tionality, and must therefore be given to it by this House.

When Mr. Patterson, the former Delegate from the Territory of Colorado, was here a short time ago he said (and he himself a democrat) that it was an error to raise the question of the admission of Mr. Belford, the Representative elected from Colorado; that the State had complied with the act under which it was to be admitted, and that Mr. Belford should be admitted to the present Congress. I state this in justice to Mr. Patterson, as the opposition press of his State has represented him as using his influence against the recognition of the State and the admission of his successor.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement in reference to the action of the people of Colorado?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Not at present, as my time is fast going.
Mr. SPRINGER. Allow me to have printed in the RECORD, then, a resolution of a public meeting of the people of the Territory of Colorado upon that subject.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I have no objection to that.

There being no objection, leave was granted accordingly. [For preamble and resolution referred to, see end of speech.]

Mr. CAULFIELD. But, Mr. Speaker, this Congress is barred by its own act against making any question as to Colorado now being a State in this Union. The President's proclamation was issued on the 1st day of August, 1876; and fifteen days afterward Congress passed the act, which will be found on page 158 of the statutes passed at the first session of this Congress, appropriating money as follows:

For salaries of governor, chief-justice, and two associate judges, at $3,000 each, and secretary at $2,000-$14,000: Provided. That said officers shall only receive their compensation on the basis of the salary aforesaid up to the time of the admission of said Territory as a State into the Union.

This act is an admission and recognition of the fact that Colorado had already been admitted as a State. This, Mr. Speaker, we are bound by, and we cannot now go behind it. In good faith no question should be made about Colorado's status in the Union. Congress certainly intended to admit her upon compliance with the terms of the enabling act, and Colorado intended to be admitted, and for that purpose complied with those terms. Believing she was admitted, (as I believe she was,) she has participated in the presidential election and chosen three presidential electors who have east their votes for President of the United States. If there is any force whatever in the question as to Colorado's admission, it is entirely too technical for serious consideration under existing circumstances. The refusal to admit the state of the Colorado and involve consideration under existing circumstances. mit the member from Colorado would involve consequences bearing upon her electoral vote, which no partisan consideration can excuse apon her electoral vote, which no partisan consideration can excuse or palliate. A resolution passed now admitting Colorado as a State in the Union, her admission dating from this time, can have no retroactive effect or validity upon her electoral vote already cast, and would give rise to questions productive of no good, but probably of much harm to the country.

Kentucky was admitted without any inquiry by Congress as to the harmeter of her constitution. Vermont was admitted in the same character of her constitution. Vermont was admitted in the same way, and the same is true as to the admission of Tennessee.

The simple declaration that her member is entitled to a seat on this floor is but justice to Colorado, to the member himself, and to the country; and I shall therefore vote for such a resolution and against the resolution of the minority report.

The following are the preamble and resolution referred to above by

Mr. SPRINGER:

Mr. SPRINGER:

Whereas a portion of the democratic central committee, at a meeting held at Denver on the 8th instant, did, without consulting the democracy of the Territory of Colorado, proceed to pass certain resolutions condemning the action of the House of Representatives of the United States in not recognizing Colorado as a State and admitting the Representative;

And whereas all of the resolutions passed at that meeting, except the eighth and ninth, are heartily indorsed by the democracy of Pueblo County: Therefore, Resolved, That the democrats of Pueblo County, in convention assembled, do hereby repudiate and condemn the action of said committee, believing the constitution was carried by means of outrageous frauds in the northern portions of the Territory, as exemplified by the unprecedented vote polled in Denver, Georgetown, and other northern points; that we cordially indorse the sentiments expressed in the letter of Hon. W. M. SPRINGER, of Illinois, of December 23, 1876, to Hon. T. M. Patterson, and would call upon Congress to thoroughly investigate the law in the case previous to taking any action in the premises.

Mr. KNOTT. While I think that I could demonstrate that Colorado is as much a State in this Union as the Commonwealth which I rado is as much a State in this Union as the Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, I cannot fail to recognize the fact that the House is already wearied, and that no remarks that I might submit would have the effect of changing a solitary vote upon the pending question. I therefore forego the privilege of addressing the House upon the pending resolution, and in deference to what I know is the desire of a large majority of the members I now call for a vote. call for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox.) The first question is upon the preamble and bill proposed by the minority of the committee as a substitute for the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Whereas, on the 3d day of March, 1875, Congress passed an act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and offered to admit said State when so formed into the Union upon certain conditions therein speciple of Colorado to form a constitution and processal State when so formed into the Union upon certain conditions therein specified;

And whereas it appears that the said people have adopted a constitution, which, upon due examination, is found to conform to the provisions and comply with the conditions of said act and to be republican in its form of government, and that they now ask for admission into the Union: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the constitution and government which the people of Colorado have formed for themselves be, and the same are hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and that the said State of Colorado shall be, and is hereby, declared to be one of the United States of America, and is hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being—ayes 20, noes 107. So the substitute submitted by the minority of the committee was not adopted.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the following resolution reported by the majority of the committee:

Resolved, That Colorado is a State in this Union, and that James B. Belford, Representative-elect from said State, be sworn and admitted to his seat as such.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the Representative from Colorado be now

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISCHARGE OF THE WITNESS E. W. BARNES.

Mr. KNOTT reported, from the Committee on the Judiciary, the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas E. W. Barnes has delivered to the select committee, of which Hon. W. R. Morrison is chairman, the telegrams in his possession, in pursuance of the order of this House:

Resolved, That said Barnes be, and he is hereby, discharged from custody.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF HON. FRANK HEREFORD.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, and Mr. KASSON reserved all points of order on the bill.

SURVEY OF PUBLIC LANDS-INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WALDRON reported, from the Committee on Appropriations, the following resolution; which was considered and adopted.

Resolved. That the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from further consideration of so much of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations required by the various Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and prior years, as relates to the surveying of the public lands and to Indian affairs, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WALDRON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CLYMER, by unanimous consent, the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4306) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House take a recess until half past

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House take a recess until hair past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. SPRINGER. Allow me to introduce two bills for reference.

Mr. HOLMAN. Several gentlemen have desired me to yield. I think I must insist on my motion. [Cries of "Régular order!"]

Mr. PAGE. Pending the motion for a recess, I move that the House mow adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope we shall not adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 142.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. Holman's motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) took a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

At half past seven o'clock the House resumed its session, the Speaker in the chair.

POWERS AND PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. DURHAM. The Senate amendments to which we have agreed are all of a verbal character. The Senate having receded from the of the powers, privileges, and duties of the House of Representa-tives in connection with counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that subject be postponed.

The SPEAKER. Until when †

Mr. HOLMAN. I will name next Monday.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Let it be until after the electoral

Mr. FOSTER. Indefinitely. [Laughter.]
Mr. CONGER. May I inquire what is the next business?
The SPEAKER. The next business will be the morning hour.
Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the consideration of the unfinished business be postponed until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

T. E. MALEY.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table a letter from the Secretary of War in reference to the case of T. E. Maley, and to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs; which motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. It is so referred by unanimous consent, with the understanding that it is not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. HAYMOND, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to print in the RECORD as part of the debates some remarks which he had pre-pared on the subject of internal improvements.

CORRECTION OF VOTE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In the RECORD, on passing the bill abolishing the police board in this District over the veto of the President, I am recorded as voting in the affirmative. I voted in the negative, and wish to be so recorded.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

Mr. GOODIN, by unanimous consent, moved the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (S. No. 619) to carry out in part the provisions of the act entitled "An act to abolish the tribal relations of the Miami Indians, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, and the same be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which motion was agreed to.

OMAHA BRIDGE.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour for reports of committees begins at twenty-four minutes to eight o'clock, and the call rests with gins at twenty-four minutes to eight o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 1547) limiting rates for the transportation of freight and passengers over the bridge constructed by the Union Pacific Railroad Company across the Missouri River at Omaha, Nebraska, be made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for Tuesday next. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Philips,] who desires to submit the views of the minority, is not now present, and I hope there will be no objection to my motion.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not to interfere with appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that measure confined to one subject-matter?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that measure confined to one subject-matter?
Mr. THROCKMORTON. It is.
Mr. O'BRIEN. I suggest that it come in after the morning hour

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Yes, sir; and not to interfere with appropriation bills.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.
Mr. THROCKMORTON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

OREGON CENTRAL RAILROAD.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported back a bill (S. No. 146) extending the time for the completion of the Oregon Central Railroad and Telegraph Line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon, with amendments, and moved its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the bill and amendments be printed.

Mr. LANE. Is it in order to move to put the bill on its passage at

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve all points of order.
Mr. CONGER. I demand the reading of the bill.
Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Maryland only wants it referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If

The bill and amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] makes a point of order against the bill. The gentleman will indicate what is his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order is that the extension of time made by the bill is a grant of property within the rule of the House.

Mr. LANE. I ask the ruling of the Chair. I understand the Chair has ruled upon that point before.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is the extension of an old grant upon new conditions

Mr. LANE. And those new conditions are in favor of the settlers and against the railroad.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole House on the Public Cal-

CLAIMS FOR SURVEY OF PUBLIC LANDS, ETC.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, from the Committee of Claims, reported back the resolution of the House of April 27, 1876, referring certain claims for surveying public lands and for Indian service to the Com-mittee of Claims; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to hear read the paper which the gentleman from Missouri has sent to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations required by the various Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and prior years.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. That is the whole letter from the Secand the Treasury making estimates for deficiencies in the various Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876. It is not necessary to read the whole document. It includes innumerable claims, whereas the claims reported back by the Committee of Claims occupy only a small portion of the document. The letter which the gentleman from Michigan asks to have read is not pertinent to the matter before the House except in one portion of it which I can designate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] insist upon the reading of the paper.

Mr. CONGER. I think it had better be read. I am not familiar with the contents of the paper.
The SPEAKER. It will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the letter from the Secretary of the

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that what we have already heard be taken as equivalent to the reading of the whole document. It will take two hours to read all.

It will take two hours to read all.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be read beyond the morning hour. The reading will cease with the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not suppose the gentleman from Michigan wishes to occupy the whole morning hour with the reading of something to which he does not himself pay attention.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. If the gentleman from Michigan will permit me to say a word, I wish to explain that the matter now being read as I have already stated is not pertinent at all to the report made by the Committee of Claims. What is reported back by the Committee of Claims is simply a resolution referring to that committee two items in a deficiency bill. On behalf of the committee I report back the resolution with the request that it should go to the Committee on Appropriations. Nothing therefore ought to be read under this application except the resolution itself, which the Clerk will find among the papers.

mr. HURD. I insist on the reading of the document.
Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, is the motion which I made in order?
The SPEAKER. It is not.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CONGER, (interrupting the reading.) I do not call for the further reading of the paper.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] has demanded the reading.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the paper.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, (interrupting.) Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to move to dispense with the further reading of that paper?

Nobody is listening to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the reading of the paper having been entered upon cannot now be interrupted by a motion of

The Clerk resumed and continued the reading of the paper until the expiration of the morning hour.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. COX. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table. I believe that motion is now in

Mr. FOSTER. When it was proposed this afternoon that the House should take a recess, I said to gentlemen around me not to oppose it because I supposed from the fact that it was the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] who was making the motion, that the evening session would be devoted to the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. COX. There was no understanding about that.

Mr. FOSTER. I have learned since that there was no such understanding. But I said to the gentlemen around me at the time that I supposed the legislative bill would be the business at the evening sion, and I feel under obligations to them to resist the motion of the gentleman from New York. I am perfectly willing that we should go on with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill, but I am not willing that any other business should be transacted to-night.

Mr. HOLMAN. I stated in the afternoon that the object of having a session to-night was to proceed with general legislative business, and from that I suppose the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] naturally took up the impression that the legislative bill was to be considered.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, is my motion in order that we proceed to dispose of business on the Speaker's table?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there can be no objection to the House now proceeding to dispose of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. FOSTER. There is objection.

Mr. COX. The Speaker's table is encumbered with business.
Mr. FOSTER. There is objection, and we will insist on it.
Mr. CAULFIELD. And we will persist.
The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from New York is in order.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not deny the propriety of making the motion; but if the motion is insisted on, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] moves that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, and pending that motion the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. Pending that motion, I move that the House take a recess until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust this business will not be entered upon until

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust this business will not be entered upon until gentlemen on the other side are aware that there is business on the Speaker's table to which they object.

Mr. FOSTER. The business of this House can be carried along best by proceeding at once to the consideration of the appropriation bills. They are very far behind, and we can take up the legislative bills. They are very far behind, and we can take up the legislative bill. But I warn gentlemen opposite that this motion will be resisted on this side of the House by every parliamentary motion known to the rules of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Ohio does not charge me with bad faith in this matter?

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all; but I wish to say another word in reference to this subject.

Mr. COX. I object to debate.

Mr. HUBBELL. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet to-morrow at nine o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order; it is a change of the rules of the House.

Mr. PAGE. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Saturday morning.

Mr. RICE. I call for the regular order.
Mr. JOYCE. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from California by substituting Friday for Saturday.
The SPEAKER. That motion to adjourn until Friday is in order, but the motion of the gentleman from California is not in order, because it causes an adjournment over for more than three days.

Mr. HANCOCK. I think the law of Congress requires us to meet

Mr. HANCOCK. I think the law of Congress requires us to meet to-morrow, and therefore that we cannot adjourn over.

Mr. PAGE. Do I understand the Chair to say that an adjournment until Saturday would be beyond the constitutional limit?

Mr. SPRINGER. The laws require the House to be in session to-morrow; no motion to adjourn over can be in order.

Mr. COX. I understood the gentleman from California to move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Saturday. I make the point of order that to-morrow is fixed for business connected with the clearer leadings and the counting of the votes for President and the electoral college and the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and therefore we cannot adjourn over until Saturday.

Vice-President, and therefore we cannot adjourn over until Saturday.

Mr. FOSTER. The meeting to-morrow is in joint convention.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The law says that the House shall be in session on the 1st of February.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say upon the point of order that the law reads that "the Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock p. m. on the first Thursday in February, A. D. 1877;" and that this law was passed in obedience to and for the execution of a provision of the Constitution of the United States. The Chair thereprovision of the Constitution of the United States. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order that a motion to adjourn which would vacate the session of to-morrow is not in order.

Mr. PAGE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.
The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and called the name of JOSIAH G. ABBOTT.

G. ABBOTT.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. How many motions to adjourn can be made? How many dilatory motions are in order? Mr. CONGER. That point does not arise here.

The SPEAKER. That point is not yet reached.

Mr. COX. Still it would be pleasant information to the gentleman from Michigan Thr. Coxygn. 1 from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has moved to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered upon the motion to lay upon the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair. Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that question.

s and nays were ordered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question upon which the yeas and nays are now about to be called? The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa now moves to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order that it is not in order to call the yeas and nays on the question of ordering the yeas and

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. It is too late to make that point, even if it were well taken, as the roll-call has already been commenced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read from the Manual on the subject:

An order for the yeas and nays or refusal of the yeas and nays may be reconsidered.

The Chair therefore entertains the motion.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I appeal from that decision of the Chair. [Laughter.] Mr. HOLMAN.

There can be but one appeal pending at a time.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I withdraw the appeal.
Mr. SPRINGER. This is a subsidiary question, and it is not in order to pile one subsidiary motion on another; if that can be done no business can ever be reached or disposed of.

Mr. FOSTER. I object to the Chair being bull-dozed after he has made his decision. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. You are bull-dozing the Chair.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I call the gentleman to order, and demand that his words be taken down. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 25, nays 188, not voting 77; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll, Mr. SCALES said: My colleague, Mr. YEATES, is confined to his room by sickness.

The question recurred upon laying upon the table the appeal from the decision, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the House that a portion of the members must be under a misapprehension; there is no occasion whatever for alarm in reference to the business on the Speaker's table. The Chair presumes, however, that the gentlemen who make these dilatory motions are apprehensive in relation to two papers which the Chair now holds in his hand. He therefore would ask unanimous consent that he may present them at this time.

Mr. PAGE. What are they?

The SPEAKER. The titles will be read, and then the Chair will listen to objections. The Chair thinks that gentlemen had better withdraw their motions.

Mr. FOSTER. And after that what?

Mr. PAGE. What does the Chair propose to do with the papers?

The SPEAKER. Whatever the House may determine.

Mr. PAGE. Does it require unanimous consent to present them? The SPEAKER. The Chair asks unanimous consent to present these papers. Let the titles be read, after which objections can be made. The Chair desires to state to gentleman that it will be found that exact duplicates of these papers have been placed in possession of the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

Mr. HUBBELL. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table; I had no idea that it would make all this trouble.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] has no right to withdraw that motion at this time.

Mr. FOSTER. We know very well what the papers are.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has been asked by the Chair to mr. PAGE. What do the papers purport to be?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the titles read.
Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I object.
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to having the titles read? The Chair simply asks unanimous consent to present these papers, and desires that the titles be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The Chair does not then lay them before the House for action?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is simply to ascertain whether the Chair can obtain unanimous consent to present them at this time.

The SPEAKER. That is all.
The Clerk read the titles of the papers, as follows:

An authenticated copy of an act to declare and establish the ap-pointment by the State of Florida of electors of President and Vice-

A record of proceedings on an information in the nature of a quo warranto, in the circuit court of the second district of Florida, The State of Florida ex rel. Wilkinson Call et al. against Charles H. Pearce

Mr. PAGE. What does the Chair propose to have done with those papers?

The SPEAKER. To let the House say what shall be done with them.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the presenting of the papers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then avail himself of his right as a member of this House to place these papers in the petition-box.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table.

ELECTION IN FLORIDA.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to make a privileged report. I submit from the select committee on the election in Florida a report in writing, with the accompanying testimony, and I ask that the report be

Mr. CONGER. Is there not a motion to adjourn pending and undisposed of ?

Mr. PAGE. An appeal from the decision of the Chair, as well as a motion to adjourn, is pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] withdrew his motion to go to business on the Speaker's table, and of course all the other motions fall with it.

Mr. PAGE. The motion to adjourn fell with the withdrawal of the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] withdrew the motion.

Mr. CONGER. I objected to his withdrawing his motion.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that "a motion may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment, " " and all and all incidental questions fall with such withdrawal."

Mr. PAGE. That does not affect the motion to adjourn.
Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will listen when order is restored.
[After a prolonged pause for the restoration of order.] Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Thompson] yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. THOMPSON. No, sir; I decline to yield.

Mr. PAGE. There was a motion to adjourn pending before the gentleman from Massachusetts was recognized at all; and the yeas and nays had been ordered upon that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdrew his motion to go to the Speaker's table, and the Manual is very clear in the statement that all incidental motions made in connection with that motion must fall with it.

Mr. PAGE. But I ask the ruling of the Chair as to whether a motion to adjourn is not an independent motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled that the gentleman from New York withdrew his motion to go to the Speaker's table, and with that withdrawal all incidental motions fell. The Chair then recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts, who had a right to be recognized, as he rose to make a report from a committee authorized to report at any time.

Mr. CONGER. I appeal from that decision of the Chair.
Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.
Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think there was a misunderstanding perhaps. I understand the proceedings to have been something like this: the gentleman from New York moved to go to the Speaker's table; pending that a motion to adjourn was made. Now pending the action of the House on the motion to adjourn the gentleman from New York could no doubt rise to withdraw the motion to go to the Speaker's table, although I do not very well see how he could be recognized to do it. But that did not interfere at all with the motion to adjourn—a motion of the highest privilege known to the rules of the House. Unless that motions was withdrawn the sense of the House must be taken on it.

House must be taken on it.

The SPEAKER. All incidental and dilatory motions fell of course with the withdrawal of the motion to go to the Speaker's table.

Mr. PAGE. The Chair has no right to decide that the motion to adjourn was a dilatory motion.

Mr. COX. I make the point of order that nothing is in order except the reading of the report of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I thought I had the floor at one time, and I have never yielded it.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] never had it. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is on the floor on a point of order.

point of order point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. A motion to adjourn over and a motion to adjourn cannot very well be decided to be dilatory motions; and even if that were not true, the right of the minority to make dilatory motions is known to none better than to the gentleman who now occupies the Chair, for I recollect that he kept me here once forty-six and one-half hours by motions of that class.

Now the motion to adjourn is a highly privileged motion, the ver highest known to the House except a motion to fix the time to which the House shall adjourn. Pending the action of the House on the motion to adjourn the gentleman from New York could not get the floor, could not be recognized to withdraw his motion. The House gave the Chair unanimous consent to make a statement, but it was to ascertain whether we would give him leave to do certain things. Objection was made. Then the gentleman from New York withdrew the motion to go to the Speaker's table. But the motion to adjourn, the motion to go to the Speaker's table. But the motion to adjourn, if insisted on, must be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa say that a gentleman having the floor can be taken off the floor within the period of one hour by another member making a motion to adjourn?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But my point of order is that the gentleman from New York did not get the floor and could not get it until we had determined what we would do with the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion fell, as the Chair has heretofore stated with the withdrawed of the motion to go to the Speaker's stated, with the withdrawal of the motion to go to the Speaker's table.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is the very point I raise—that it cannot fall. The motion to adjourn is of too high dignity to fall. There is no such thing as that motion falling.

Mr. COX. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is speaking to a point of order.

Mr. COX. I make another point of order.

The SPEAKER. Two questions of order cannot be made at once.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I say in the presence of the gentleman Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I say in the presence of the gentleman from New York and every other gentleman here that I would not knowingly make a representation to the Chair that I did not believe to be absolutely correct. I do not want you, Mr. Speaker, or any other gentleman occupying that high position, to make a bad ruling. I believe that the rules under which we act are a structure of greater beauty than the Capitol in which we sit. I would rather see a man go to the top of this Capitol and toss down the stones one after auother, even if every stone killed a citizen, than see the rules of the House wrongly administered; for a wrong decision, like the archangel spoken of by Milton, strikes squadrons at once. I submit that the motion to adjourn must be acted on. Of course if the Chair deides otherwise I have nothing to say.

Mr. COX. I beg to say one word. I submit that no point of order can be made in a frivolous and dilatory way that would take the gentleman from Massachusetts off the floor when he is presenting a questional statement of the same of tion of the highest privilege, in which we are all interested for tomorrow's work. So the Chair has decided.

Mr. PAGE. I do not understand the Chair has decided that point.
Mr. COX. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor and is proceeding to make his report.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. That is the question.

Mr. COX. And you have no right by raising points of order to break him down in his patriotic endeavor to bring these facts before the House on a question of high privilege.

MEMBERS of the republican side. Ah!

Mr. CONGER. I appeal to the Chair whether he decides that the motion to adjourn fell with the withdrawal of the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the gentleman from New York withdrew his motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table. Then some time elapsed and no effort was made on the part of anybody on the point of order as to the motion to adjourn until the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Thompson] was actually on his feet and had stated that he rose to submit a report from a committee which had the right to report at any time, and was recognized by the Chair to make that privileged report. The Chair now submits to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] or to anybody else, whether under such a state of facts he could be allowed or would be in any way warranted in entertaining a motion to adjourn while the gentleman from Massachusetts was upon the floor and in the very act of presenting his report to the House, the Clerk at the desk having proceeded with the reading of the written report?

Mr. COX. Nor would the Chair under the circumstances be justified in entertaining an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. The point is that there is now pending a motion to adjoin.

adjourn.
The SPEAKER. Not pending.
Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir; a motion pending that the House adjourn.
The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that motion to adjourn fell with the withdrawal of the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. CONGER. Then from that decision of the Speaker I appeal.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The motion was withdrawn at the request of the Speaker.

Mr. CONGER. The yeas and navs were ordered on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table was withdrawn by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Hardly any one listening at the time but will agree the motion of the gentleman from New York to go to the business upon the Speaker's table was withdrawn. In reply to a parliamentary inquiry the Chair replied that with the withdrawal of that motion all incidental motions fell, the motion to adjourn included. The tion all incidental motions fell, the motion to adjourn included. The House then proceeded without objection to the consideration of other business, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Thompson,] who, under the authority of this House, had leave to report at any time. He was recognized to make such privileged report, and he did make such privileged report, and the House proceeded to its consideration. The Chair thinks it is not competent according to the rules under such a state of facts, the House having proceeded to the consideration of other business, to entertain a motion to adjourn which would have the effect to take the gentleman from Massachusetts off the floor. Nor can the motion to adjourn adjourn man from Massachusetts off the floor. Nor can the motion to adjourn be entertained until the hour to which the gentleman from Massa-

Mr. CONGER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CROUNSE. The point of order is raised as to his right to hold the floor

The SPEAKER. That right cannot be disputed, as the right was given by the House originally that he might report at any time.

Mr. CROUNSE. What is the right of a member of this House if the Chair can arbitrarily—

The SPEAKER. The Chair has arbitrarily done nothing.

Mr. CROUNSE. Let me submit, with all respect to the Chair, that he has decided the gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The report of the committee is as follows:

The House of Representatives on the 4th day of December, 1876, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That three special committees, one of fifteen members to proceed to Louisiana, one of six members to proceed to Florida, and one of nine members to proceed to South Carolina, shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate the recent elections therein and the action of the returning or canvassing boards in the said States in reference thereto, and to report all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the electors of the said States for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to a fair understanding thereof by the people; and that for the purpose of speedily executing this resolution the said committees shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to take testimony, and, at their discretion, to detail subcommittees, with like authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony; and that the said committees and their subcommittees may employ stenographers, clerks, and messengers, and be attended each by a deputy sergeant-atarns; and said committees shall have leave to report at any time, by bill or other wise."

raphers, clerks, and messengers, and be attended each by a deputy sergeant-arms; and said committees shall have leave to report at any time, by bill or other wise."

Your committee appointed under the foregoing resolution proceeded at once to Florida and made the examination called for by said resolution. They found that the board of State canvassers, consisting of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, and the comptroller, had pretended to canvass the county returns of the vote of November 7, 1876, according to law, and that by said canvass they returned a majority of votes not only for the republican candidates for governor and lieutenant-governor, but also for the republican presidential electors.

The canvass made by that board is shown to be false by the minutes made by the board itself upon the county returns. The board had no power but simply to canvass the county returns, or in the words of the statute to "determine and declare who shall have been elected to any such office, or as such member, as shown in such returns." They had no power to determine as to specific votes, but simply the power and duty, in case any "such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration."

This is the whole power conferred by the laws of Florida upon that board. Still in direct violation of the law they did go behind the county returns and inquired into and determined judicially upon the validity of the elections at several precincts, and in some cases to reject whole precincts, and in others to reject specific votes. They also rejected the vote of an entire county without any legal anthority for so doing. Your committee decided not to examine into the evidence presented before the board of State canvassers, as their action was wholly illegal, and the evidence upon which the board acted could not wholly Tilden's electors' majority 90. To this should be added the return of the vote of the eighth precinct, pond 11, in Clay County, which gave a majority of 23 votes for the Tilden electors, which are fairly canvassed for them, although not included in the enumeration, making their majority 113.

(There are but 3 votes' difference between the highest and lowest vote on the democratic ticket, and not more than 10 difference between the highest and lowest on the republican ticket.)

This is the result upon the face of the returns, counting the full and correct returns (and not the partial and fraudulent returns) from and which beyond all reasonable question should be counted. It is provided by act of the State of Florida of August 6, 1868, section 24, as follows:

"On the sixth day after any election, or sooner if the returns shall have been received, it shall be the duty of the county judge and clerk of the circuit court to meet at the office of said clerk and take to their assistance a justice of the peace of the county, (and in case of the absence, sickness, or other disability of the county judge or clerk, the sheriff shall act in his place.) and shall publicly proceed to canvass the votes given for the several officers and persons, as shown by the returns on file in the office of such clerk or judge, and shall then make and sign duplicate certificates containing, in words and figures, written at full length, the whole number of votes given for each office, the names of the persons for whom such votes were given for each office, the names of the persons for whom such votes were given for each office, the names of the persons for whom such votes were given for such office. It is difficult to conceive of a more wicked attempt to defraud the people of their votes and impose upon the State and county officers not the choice of the people, than is here presented. Your committee endeavored to obtain Judge Dreiggers as a witness but did not succeed in finding him, and are clearly of the opinion that he intentionally avoided the officer who endeavored to find and summon him as a witness. The testimony of the clerk, Coxe, and Justice Dorman is clear that they were at the clerk's office on Monday, the 13th, in answer to the notice of Judge Dreiggers, that the judge saw them and declined to can vass with the clerk, and that the clerk offered to assist the judge in making the canvass. It also appears from the evidence of both the clerk and the sheriff that on Monday, November 13, when the judge refused to join the clerk in making a board of county canvassers, the clerk requested the sheriff to act with him, and the sheriff also refused; so that the presumption of law and fact that the sheriff had no right to act with the judge under the circumstances is in perfect accordance with the proven facts in the case. Everything upon the face of the returns signed by Coxe and Dorman on the 13th of November, with the papers accompanying the same, show that their canvass was correct and legal, (the absence of both judge and sheriff being accounted for,) and that the return made by them is clearly the return which the State board of canvassers were in law and justice bound to canvass.

The canvass by the clerk (Coxe) and the justice of the peace (Dorman) on the 10th day of November was made to protect the actual vote of the county and as a means to preserve the evidence of that vote. The clerk received notice that a fraud with

CLAY COUNTY.

The return of Clay County is regular upon its face, and there is nothing to impeach it in the slightest degree. The vote for the Hayes electors as aggregated by the county canvassers was 122, and the vote for the Tilden electors 286. The said county canvassers certify on their return that at precinct No. 8 (pond No. 11) the Tilden electors received 29 votes and the Hayes electors 6 votes, which were not included by them in the enumeration made because it did not appear that the inspectors at said poll were sworn. The vote at this precinct being added, as it certainly should be, would make the entire vote of the county, as appears on the face of the return, 315 for the Tilden electors and 128 for the Hayes electors. This precinct is fairly canvassed. The statement that there was no evidence of the inspectors being sworn is not a material part of the return and does not show a sufficient reason for rejecting the vote there cast.

The vote of this precinct is fairly canvassed and the result stated with clearness and certainty. The statement attached to the returns taken from Green Cove Springs precinct No. 1, that Samuel J. Tilden received 74 votes and Thomas A. Hendricks 74 votes, was clearly made by the inspectors taking the names on the heading of the democratic ticket, and they are in no sense votes and were not to be taken and were not taken into the count by the board of county canvassers a part of the electoral vote. This appears upon the face of the returns of the board of county canvassers; so that it cannot be said with any truth that there is anything in relation to the returns from Clay County which is either false or fraudulent or uncertain. In fact this return bears upon its face the evidence of a careful desire to faithfully perform their duty on the part of the board of county canvassers, and the certificate of returns is entitled to as much weight as any return from any county in the State.

In point of fact the inspectors at this precinct were sworn as appears by the testimony. But we are willing to rest this point upon the face of the return.

DUVAL COUNTY.

incentificate of returns is entitled to as much weight as any return from any county in the State.

The veturns from this county give 2.867 votes for the Haves electors and 1,427 votes for this limit at the county of the count cast and were void. The issue being solely one as to the validity of the returns, as was clearly shown upon the pleadings, the decision of the court that the returns are legal and they must be counted is conclusive and binding upon all parties claiming under said returns. The validity and effect of those certificates of returns is res adjudicata and cannot be tried again in any case where the right to an office by a person whose vote is set forth therein is thereafter called in question, an inspection of the returns being the only thing necessary to be done in order to ascertain who has been elected. It follows that the fact having been judicially ascertained that the persons named upon the face of the returns as having received the highest number of votes were elected, your committee submit that in order to ascertain who were chosen presidential electors this House has only to look upon the face of the record and read the words and figures which determine that result. These certificates having been made a matter of record, it is only necessary in order to determine the result that the record be read.

Your committee, therefore, are of opinion that the fact having been judicially determined that the Hayes electors did not receive a majority of the votes cast at the election, that that determination has involved in it as a necessary incident the denial of their right to cast their votes as presidential electors, and no determination other than that which has been made by the supreme court of the State of Florida is required to show that the act of those electors in casting their votes for President and Vice-President is illegal and void. This conclusion appears the more just when we consider that the real parties to the suit are not so much George F. Drew and the State board of canvassers as the democratic voters and the republican voters of the State, and the decision of the supreme court is a substantial determination as to which party's candidates were duly elected. It will not be claimed that the court is bo

Sec. 2. W. D. BLOXHAM, Secretary of State.

The result of this canvass is set forth in detail in the evidence.

The returns from the several boards of county canvassers clearly show the election of the Tilden electors by a majority of at least 90 votes. No legal canvass of the returns as they appear in the office of the secretary of state of Florida can show a different result. It is as certain as testimony can make it that under the laws of Florida the Tilden electors should have had from the board of State canvassers certificates showing their election. In other words, the evidence which the laws of Florida provide for showing the result of an election shows beyond all fair controversy that the Tilden electors did receive a majority of at least 90 votes, and were consequently elected.

It should be borne in mind, in considering the certificates of the boards of county canvassers, that a majority on nearly, if not all, of those boards are republicans, and that a majority on nearly all of the precinct canvassing boards rererepublicans, and therefore the result as stated in the declaration of these precinct and county canvassing boards cannot be presumed to be any more favorable to the candidates of the democratic party than the facts will fully warrant. This being the situation of the vote of Florida as it appears from the returns which the law provides shall be the evidence of the result, the question is whether there is anything in the manner of the conducting of the election on the part of the supporters of the Tilden electors in the State of Florida to vitiate and reverse that result. This is certainly an important question, and in considering the testimony bearing upon it one fact should be kept constantly in view, which must have a great influence upon all who consider the question. It is this, the governor of Florida was a republican candidate for re-election and had the appointment of all the officers of the State except constables. This put the whole machinery of the government in the hands of the republican party, under circumstances which woul make them most vigilant to see that no possible advantage should be taken of it or its candidates for office, and there was at least the usual temptation on the part of those having the agencies of the government in their control to use those agencies to the utmost verge of a most liberal construction of their powers in that direction which might be most favorable to the success of their candidates, and thereby continue themselves in office.

The county commissioners had the appointment of all the voting-places and election officers, except clerks, (the clerks being appointed by the inspectors appointed by the county commissioners) and they had also the power of revising the registration-list. A majority of the election officers were republicans at nearly every voting-precinct. This gave them every facility to commit fraud if so inclined and to prevent its commission if attempted by others. There is, therefore, nothing in the situation going to make it probable that the supporters of the Tilden electors, rather than the supporters of the Hayes electors, were guilty of any frauds in the election.

rather than the supporters of the Hayes electors, were guilty of any frauds in the election.

Without discussing the general questions as to the powers of either House of Congress or both combined to go into the question of the details of an election in a State for presidential electors, your committee say that although they are not specifically charged with the duty of examining into the matter of intimidation, they feel justified in declaring that they did not hear any one seriously claim that there was any intimidation of the colored voters by the white people of Florida, and that there is not any evidence going to show that the people of Florida were not as quiet and free from all disturbing influences at the late presidential election calculated to wrongfully affect an election as the people of any other State in the Union. The election was regularly conducted in accordance with the forms of law prescribed by the State, and there is nothing in the mode of conducting it which ought to vitiate it or throw distrust upon it except in a few instances to which we specially refer. There were irregularities in conducting the elections at some of the precincts, as there must always of necessity be from accident, inattention to the provisions of law, and the presiding at elections of unskillful persons, where there is an honest intent and no disposition to commit a fraud. There were some cases of most clear, direct, and flagrant fraud.

LEON COUNTY.

where there is an honest intent and no disposition to commit a fraud.

LEON COUNTY.

At the very commencement of their examination at Tallahassee, in Leon County, your committee found that one Joseph Bowes, a leading republican positician and a prominent office-holder, and one Wiley Jones, a republican, went from Tallahassee to Richardson's school-house, a voting place about ten miles distant from Tallahassee, known as Richardson's school-house precinct, No. 13, for the purpose of acting as election officers, and that said Bowes did act as an inspector of election and the said Jones did act as clerk. It was also proved that Lawrence Booth, a republican and a Federal office-holder, living at Saint Mark's, in the adjoining county of Wakulla, thirty miles distant, acted as one of the inspectors. It appeared that said Bowes had in his possession a quantity of small ballots with the names of the republican candidates thereon, the ballots being about an inch and a half square. It also appeared that 73 of those ballots were found in the ballot-box was during the whole day at said precinct, that although he watched all day the putting of votes into the ballot-box, he did not see one of those small ballots put into the box, and that he was satisfied that none of them was voted at that precinct. Leon T. Roberts, a United States supervisor of election, also testified that he was all day sitting by the ballot-box and watching the ballots as they were deposited in the ballot-box, and did not see one of the small votes deposited in said ballot-box.

The poll-list at this precinct was suspicious in its character, there being three pages of names, amounting to seventy-two names in all, which had the appearance of being written all at one time and in the same handwriting, and not like the rest of the poll-list, which was written by different persons. Neither the names on said poll-list not he pages of said list were numbered, differing in that respect from all the other poll-lists in Leon County, which were sixteen in number.

Tilden electors, making a difference of 72 votes in favor of the Tilden electors. This is the most liberal construction that can possibly be given to the vote for the Hayes electors.

In considering and ascertaining the true result of an election, very little attention should ordinarily be paid to mere irregularities which do not affect the real merits of the case. It is impossible to define exactly the degree of irregularity and illegality in the conduct of an election which will render it void. Each case must depend, to a very great extent, upon its own merits, upon the circumstances as developed by the evidence. The principle is, that irregularities which do not tend to affect the result are not to defeat the will of the people; the will of the majority is to be respected even when irregularly expressed. (Jaker vs. Commonwealth, 20 Penn. St. R., 493.) In Carpenter's case, 2 Parsons, 540, the contrasy, "that although the election officers may be liable to punishment for a violation of the directory provisions of the statute, yet the people should not be punished for the detaults of their agents. That a mere irregularity or mistake on the part of the election officers, or their omission to observe some merely directory provision of the law, will not vitiate the poll or render void the election is a principle sustained by the whole current of authorities." The same general principle is recognized and supported by the following authorities: Piatt vs. People, 29 Ill., 72; Hardenburgh vs. Farmers' and Merchants' Bank, 2 Green, (N. F.,) 62; Day vs. Kent, 1 Oregon, 123; Taylor vs. Taylor, 20 Minn., 107; People vs. Bates, 11 Mich., 362; McKinney vs. O'Connor, 36 Texas, 5; Jones vs. State, 1 Kansas, 279; Gorham vs. Campbell, 2 Cal., 135; Sprage vs. Norway, 31 Cal., 173; Keller vs. Chapman, 34 Cal., 635; Brightley's Election Cases, 448, 449, 450.

The power to reject an entire poll is a dangerous one and should be exercised only in a case where it is impossible to ascertain the true vote. It must appear that the conduc in 1 Brewster, 157, the court say: "And we also re-affirm the opinion announced in Mann es. Cassidy, that when the entire proceedings connected with the conduct of an election are so tarnished by the fraudulent and negligent acts of the officers charged with the performance of the most solemn and responsible duties, so that the returns are not intelligible, or the election, because of such fraudulent conduct, is rendered unreliable in such a case, it may become obligatory on the court to throw out from the general return the entire return of such election division."

In Chadwick es. Melvin, Brightley's Digest, 250, Chief-Justice Thompson says and the such as the control of the court of

In this county the election was conducted in a very loose manner. Many of the plain provisions of the statute were ignored, and others violated. The registration-list was not corrected as required by the act approved February 24, 1875, (see session acts, 1875, Florida Legislature,) and in consequence thereof it was largely in excess of the male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years, as shown by the census taken under the provisions of said act a few months previous to the election. Prior to the election the intelligent and influential men of both political parties, for the purpose of insuring peace, good order, and fairness, entered into a written agreement that two challengers to be selected from each party should be stationed in the room near the ballot-box, whose duty it should be to challenge those persons offering to vote who were not qualified. This proposition was violated by the republican inspectors, and the challengers excluded from the room except at one poll. The county commissioners first appointed all inspectors from the republican party, but were subsequently prevailed upon to change their order and appoint one democratic inspector at each poll. The whole election machinery of the county was in the handsfof the republican party. Four out of the five county commissioners, who appoint the inspectors, the clerk of the circuit court, who is the registering officer, together with the county judge, are all members of that party. One of these last named officers on the day of election acted as clerk, the other as an inspector, and each assisted in making up the return of their respective polls. They were both exofficio members of the board of county canvassers and as such passed upon and canvassed the result of their own work, an act which, while it may not be absolutely illegal, is certainly improper and highly reprehensible, and should be condemned by all fair minded men.

The law of Florida provides that no person shall vote at any election unless he shall have been duly registered six days pr

The official return from this pell gave 570 votes for the republican and 5 votes for the democratic electors. The testimony of the voters themselves show that there were ten persons at least who voted for the democratic electors at this precinct. The canvass was not public as the law directs. There was no other evidence of fraud or irregularity at this pell, except the rapid manner in which the ballots were received and the want of care with which they were canvassed. The time occupied in counting was less than two hours. The names were not read at length, but two of the inspectors each unfolded and counted packages of twenty-five, put them together, passed them to the third, who placed them in the box, and the clerk tallied one for each package of fifty. The law of Florida makes no provision for the preservation of the ballots after the same are canvassed, but fortunately in this instance they were preserved and on a recount the next day 10 democratic ballots were found in the box. Evidently this discrepancy between the return and the proof is the result of mistake on the part of the officers, occurring from the rapidity with which the canvassing was performed. Justice demands not the rejection of the poll, but that the 5 votes proven be deducted from the republican electors and added to the democratic electors, making the poll as corrected stand 565 republican and 10 democratic votes.

In support of the rule adopted and bearing on the point, see Washburn vs. Vorhees, 2 Bartlett, 54. Reid vs. Julian, ibid, 822.

POLL EIGHT.

hees, 2 Bartlett, 54. Reid vs. Julian, ibid, 822

POLL EIGHT.

The ballot-box at this poll was concealed from the view of the voter at the time of voting, the window through which the ballots were received being 6 feet 3 inches from the ground. On counting the votes and comparing the same with the number of names on the clerk's list, it was ascertained that there were 504 ballots and 2 cotton receipts in the box, and 514 names on the clerk's list. It was subsequently ascertained that there were two double tickets, or tickets folded together, which under the law should have been destroyed, but were all canvassed, thereby increasing the number of ballots to 506. On making up the certificate, James C. Smythe, one of the inspectors, added 6 in number to the republican votes, making the return show 493 republican and 19 democratic votes, instead of 487, the actual number of republican votes found in the box. The clerk's list, the check or registration list used at this poll, the affidavits of the clerk and inspectors, have all been lost or destroyed. The officers swear they returned them with the box to the clerk of the court, the clerk swears that he never saw either of them after the election; that examination was made and they could not be found. The return shows 19 democratic ballots, when twenty-three witnesses festified that they voted the democratic ticket at this precinct. James H. Sanders swears that he placed a corresponding mark on two democratic ballots, voted one and retained the other, which he exhibited at the examination; that he was present at the canvassing and closely scrutinized each ballot as it came out of the box, and failed to find or see the marked one voted by himself. The conduct of Smythe in making the addition of 6 votes can be viewed in no other light than a deliberate purpose to falsify the return, or force the number of ballots to correspond with the number of names on the clerk's list.

But the number added by Smythe is definitely stated, and must, with the double tickets and the 4 e

Jackson county, priending the view of the voter at the time of passing his ballot to the inspector, but could be seen by the bystanders from several other windows in the room. The votes were not first counted and compared with the number of names on the clerk's list. John R. Mozley, a United States supervisor, received a number of ballots and passed them to the inspector. Immediately upon the close of the polls the inspectors proceeded to make their canvass, and did canvass 4 ballots, then took a recess and removed the box two miles to the house of John R. Mozley, where the canvass was resumed and a few additional ballots canvassed. Again they discontinued for supper and left the box in the room where the canvass was made, the windows nailed down, all persons being excluded therefrom; the box and the door of the room was locked and the keys kept by Henry Long, the republican supervisor. They returned after supper, found the box as they had left it, and completed the canvass. Prior to removing the box the same was locked by Jacob H. Stephens, the democratic supervisor, and the key given to Henry Long, the republican supervisor; they then placed it in a buggy with said Stephens and Edmond Hays, the republican inspector, and by them was conveyed to the house of Mr. Mozley. On arriving there the box was carried into the house by Mr. Stephens, accompanied by Henry Long, Edmond Hays, and the other officers, together with the crowd that followed, when Long unlocked the same and the canvass was resumed. The canvass was public. After it was understood that the box should be removed, and before starting, the announcement of the intention was made to the andience, five or six of whom followed and witnessed the canvassing, or passed in and out of the room at pleasure during the progress of the same. The reasons given by the witnesses for the removal of the box was that the church was unfinished, the windows open, the day cold and were unwilling to disclose it, either of which would rully account for the discrepancy.

But the question is, what shall be done with this poll? Shall it be rejected or can the errors, if any, be corrected? If the true vote can, with reasonable certainty be ascertained, it is our duty to apply the rule by which it can be found. The proof is conclusive that the whole number of votes cast was 189. On this point there is no conflict in the testimony; and, accepting the statements of those persons to be correct, we can arrive at the result by adding the extra 19 votes preven to the 44 republican votes returned and then deducting the 63 from the total number of votes cast, making the vote of the precinct as corrected stand for republican electors, 63; for democratic electors, 126.

If, upon any principle, this poll should be excluded from the count, the same principle applied to other precincts would exclude polls Nos. 1 and 8 in Jefferson County, poll No. 13, Richardson school-house, Leon County, and Archer Precinct, No. 2, in Alachua County. The net result of the exclusion of these entire polls would be to deduct from the total vote for the Hayes electors 1,682 votes and from

CAMPBELITON PRECINCT.

Your committee examined into the manner of conducting the election at this precinct and find everything fair. Its fairness was so apparent that the republican member of the subcommittee making the examination waived all objections to its being counted as returned.

That in the counties of Jefferson and Jackson the committee was wholly unable to discover the violence or intimidation in any manner affecting the election or that a single vote was changed thereby; on the contrary, they find that the elective franchise was exercised freely and undisturbed by all; that the only threats or attempt at intimidation or violence was made by colored persons against those of their own color who manifested a disposition to vote the democratic ticket, and even in those cases the evidence fails to establish that any person was influenced to vote against his will. The same can be said with equal truth of all the counties in the State except as already stated. There was not a syllable of evidence tending in the slightest degree to create even a suspicion that any intimidation or coercion had been practiced.

The committee found, in the course of their investigations, that many persons woted the republican ticket who were disqualitied under the constitution and laws of the State by conviction before the courts of certain offenses. Many of these convictions were for larceny, and it was urged by some members of the committee that there is no disqualitication unless the larceny amounts to a felony.

The distinction as to the grade of offenses under the statutes is between felonies and misdemeanors; the former including all crimes punishable by death or imprisonment in the State penitentiary, the latter every other offense. (Acts of 1868, page 104, section 1.) Under the statutes there is a grade of larceny where the money or goods do not exceed in value $200. ## ALACHUA COUNTY.

There has been no judicial decision upon this point by the courts of Florida.

ALACHUA COUNTY.

In this county your committee found a gross fraud committed by some of the officers of an election precinct, and a clear attempt to sustain by willful and corrupt perjury the fraud and to retain the advantages of it for the republicant ticket. This was at Archer precinct No. 2. The officers of election at the precinct were Richard H. Black, Green R. Moore, and Floyd Dukes, inspectors, and Thomas H. Vance, clerk. Black, Moore, and Vance were republicans, and Floyd Dukes, who had the misfortune not to be able to read or write, was a democrat. It is customary for the county commissioners to appoint one democrat on the board of inspectors, but your committee found in several cases the democrat put upon the board was not one who had the capacity to be very skillful in detecting fraud. The precinct is about thirteen miles from Gainesville. Vance, the clerk, lived in Gainesville, and is an active politician. The evidence shows, beyond all controversy, that not more than three hundred and sixteen votes were polled at this precinct, yet the returns showed that 535 votes were cast, so that two hundred and nincteen names were fraudulently put upon the poll-list by Vance, the clerk, of persons who did not vote at this precinct and the votes for the Hayes electror made to appear two hundred and nincteen greater than they in fact received.

There cannot be the least ground of mistake as to the existence of this fraud. The evidence showed that one Samuel T. Fleming, a merchant and a man of intelligence and probity, who was most thoroughly acquainted with the voters at Archer and vicinity, did at the request of various persons remain all day at the polls to take the name of every person who world from the one of the proof of the room in which the ballot-box was placed, and it was proven that the officers only voted from the inside of the room, 308 votes. His evidence is the only reliable evidence as to the number of votes, or that c as to who made the entry, or when it was made, or the object for which it was made, but stated he did know it was on the paper. It is clearly proven that the announcement of this vote was 180 for Stearns and 136 for Drew.

The poll-list at this precinct was stolen from the clerk's office, so that your committee did not have the opportunity of examining it. Mr. Fleming made out a list of over one hundred and sixty names which were not duplicated on the registration of persons on the poll-list at this precinct, and testified that he was sure that no one of said persons voted, and that he knew personally nearly every persons who did vote at this precinct. An attempt was made to show that there was a Pompey Godfrey in the vicinity of Archer, he being one of the men that Flening testified did not vote there and that he did not know any such man. One Allen M. Jones testified that he knew Pompey Godfrey and that he lived within two miles of Archer, whereupon your committee sent at once an officer to summon him, and had Jones go with the officer to point him out, with directions to the officer to summon the man pointed out by Jones as Pompey Godfrey. This being done Pompey Lawrence was pointed out by Jones as Pompey Godfrey. This being done Pompey Lawrence known by any other name than Pompey Lawrence. No further attempt was made to impeach this name as they had attended the same church, and he had never been known by any other name than Pompey Lawrence. No further attempt was made to impeach this name as they had attended the same church, and he had never been known by any other name than Pompey Lawrence.

It is as clear as testimory can establish a fact than not more than three hundred and sixteen persons voted at this precinct. Several persons were called who were on the poll-list as having voted at Archer No. 2, who testified that they were not at this precinct during election day, and that they voted at other precincts in this county many miles from Archer, and were not anywhere in the vicinity of Archer during ele the leaf for the returns of presidential electors to all the blanks sent out. An examination of these certificates showed that on each blank the leaf for the vote of presidential electors was attached by mucilage after the names of the inspectors were subscribed to it, as it covered in each a part of the scroll made in signing one of the names on each.

The ballot-box and all of the papers relating to this precinct were in the hands of Vance and Black, and they had full opportunity to commit the fraud and dig as clearly appears from the evidence commit it jointly, as part of the false and forget returns were in the handwriting of each of them. It is certain that Floyd Dukes could not have had any participation in this frand; he was a democrat, and certainly would not have added in committing a fraud upon the candidates of his party. It may be fairly claimed that it is certain that 136 democratic votes were cast at this precinct. It cannot be that these republican officials would commit a fraud and then attempt to sustain it by perjury and forgery to aid the party they were laboring to defeat. The ballot-box at this precinct when opened by the board of county canvassers was found to contain but 277 votes, 215 being republican votes and 62 being democratic votes. There were 35 republican votes that had not been strung, and the evidence is that all of the ballots were strung at the time they were canvassed on the night of the election, therefore it is certain that the ballot-box was stuffed with 35 republican votes. It will not be pretended, or conjectured even, that the party that would put in republican votes would take out any of the republican votes already in the box, but it is fair to presume that the man who is base and partisan enough to stuff a ballot-box with republican votes would not hesitate to steal democratic votes, and thus your committee are clearly activation of the party that would not hesitate to steal democratic votes, and thus your committee are clearly activationally and the republican votes

Some question has been raised as to two for the precincts in this county, involvable, the control of the precinct of the precinct canvasa.

The entire current of legal decisions establishes the principle "that irregularities which do not tend to affect results are not to defeat the will of the majority. (Faker vs. Commonwealth, 20 Pennsylvania Reports, 493.) The attainment of office against the clearly expressed will of the people is unworthy the ambition of any lover of a republican government, and to disfranchise an entire community because of the negligence or carelessness of those who handle their ballots is a crime against popular suffrage.

MANATER COUNTY.

MANATRE COUNTY.

The returns from the county canvassing board of this county are regular, and the supreme court of Florida ordered the State canvassing board to canvass them, and your committee find nothing to impeach those returns, while on the other hand they find the most conclusive evidence to confirm their correctness. This county was known to be a strongly democratic county, and it is clear that the then governor of Florida, who was a candidate for re-election, determined if possible to defraud the people of that county of their votes. In pursuance of this determination, about the 25th day of September preceding the late election, he accepted unconditionally the resignation of the clerk of the circuit court of this county, and did not appoint another clerk until a short time before the November election, and then did not appoint a clerk who would qualify before said election, in order, as your committee believe, to have, if possible, left undone all the preliminary acts which the clerk is required to perform. By the laws of Florida it is provided in section 10, act of August 6, 1868, as follows:

A complete copy of the list of the names of all persons duly registered as electors shall be furnished to the inspectors of election at each poll or place of voting in the county, before the hour appointed for opening the election.

There and certify such copies, and furnish the same to the sheriff at least two days before the day of holding the election, and the sheriff shall cause one of such lists to be delivered to one of such inspectors before the time of opening the election.

in the county, before the hour appointed for opening the election. The clerk shall prepare and certify such copies, and trunish the same to the sheriff at least two days before the day of holding the election, and the sheriff shall cause one of such lists to be delivered to one of such impectors before the time of opening the election. There not being a clerk to perform this duty and no evidence that it was performed by any person, over committee find that it was not done, but this in their opinion does not in the least degree affect the validity of the election in this county. The people of this county, being satisfied of the altempt made to deprive them of their votes, did all in their power to preserve the same, and did cast their votes on the day of election at the polling-places appointed by the county commissioners, and did in every particular conform to the law of the State where they were not prevented from doing so by the want of a clerk of the circuit court: one being to check the name of the voter on the registration lists he voted, and theother the depositing of a duplicate certificates of the precinct returns with and the other the depositing of a duplicate certificate of the precinct returns with a duplicate the depositing of a duplicate certificates of the precinct returns with under the depositing of a duplicate certificates delivered to the county judge. The law also provides that the canvass of the board of county canvassers may be made either from the certificates delivered to the circuit court or the county judge, so that in the matter of the precinct returns shall be made and one forwarded to the clerk of the circuit court and the other delivered to the county judge is a provision made to make it certain that the returns shall be made and one forwarded to the clerk of the circuit court and the other delivered to the county judge is a provision made to make it certain that the returns shall be where they will be furnished to the board of county canvassers. The evidence being that the county

MONROE COUNTY.

MONROE COUNTY.

The only question in this county is relative to the validity of the return from precinct No. 2. Key West. The undisputed facts are that both political parties were represented on the election board; that the election was fairly and peaceably conducted; that after the polls were closed the votes were properly and correctly counted; that the result was then announced; that 460 votes were cast; that of these the Tilden electors received 401 votes and the Hayes electors received 59 votes; that when the result was declared it was after midnight, and some or all of the officers were worn out by long fasting and confinement, and by unanimous consent they adjourned to meet at nine o clock a. m. at Kemp's place. The ballots, poll-list, and tally-sheets having been first deposited in the ballot-box, the boxed locked, and the apertures secured, the key taken by one inspector and the box by another; that at or soon after nine o'clock a. m. all of the officers of the election assembled at Kemp's store or sponge-house, about three hundred yards from the polling-place, a public place much frequented; that, all of the officers being present, the ballot-box was opened, and the officers then and there proceeded to, and did, make out the returns of the said election from the tally-sheets made before the adjournment; that the certificates of the result were in due form, were signed by all of the election officers, and were properly filed. (See pages 81 to 96, inclusive.)

The sole ground upon which these returns are attacked, and the attempt is made to disfranchise 460 legal voters, is because there was an adjournment by the election officers after the votes were counted and before the certificates were made out. The argument in favor of throwing out the vote of this precinct rests upon section 21 of the election law of Florida, which reads as follows: "As soon as the polls of an election shall be finally closed the inspectors shall proceed to canvass the an adjournment until completed." It is claimed that the making out of the cates is a part of the canvass, and that, inasmuch as there was an adjournment the completion of the count and before the making of the certificates, the law violated, and the poll should be excluded from the count.  But it is respectfully submitted that this construction of the statute is unfits severity and is not in accordance with the law. This will clearly appear an examination of section 23 of the same statute, which provides that, "theca	after w was air in upon nvass

It appears that Frederick C. Humphries, one of the candidates of the republican party of Florida for presidential electors, was appointed on the 3d of December, 1872, a shipping commissioner of the United States at the port of Pensacola, and that he qualified as such office on the 9th day of December, 1872. This appears by the certificate of the clerk of the circuit court for the northern district of Florida, which is Exhibit 54. It also appears that he entered upon the duties of that office. The said certificate shows that there is no record in said court of his having resigned said office. The office of shipping commissioner is an office of trust and profit under the United States.

Your committee deem it but just to state that their examinations were conducted openly, and as far as practicable in the vicinity in which any fraud or irregularity was alleged to have been committed, in order that if the testimony given was untrue the fact could be easily shown and the truth readily ascertained. They gave the fullest opportunity to all parties desiring to present allegations of fraud or irregularity, and did examine into all charges which were made. Your committee are fully couvinced that had not their examination been open to all and the evidence taken by them known to the public, and an opportunity given to all parties to show wherein the evidences were untrue, if in fact it were not true, their testimony could not be of any great service in determining the real facts in relation to the elections. There was not the slightest proof that the colored people of that State were in any manner restricted in the enjoyment of their political rights, but your committee were impressed with the very apparent disposition manifested on the part of the white people of Florida to treat the colored people and their rights with due consideration, and your committee believe that not only was special care taken by the supporters of the Tilden electors that no act should be done by them which could be construct to their disadvantag partisans of the opposition should have no cause for even a doubt of the honesty of their motives. This fact, your committee believe, is entitled to great weight in the consideration of this election.

Your committee are of the opinion, from the examination made by them, that were the several precincts of the State purged of all illegal votes the majority for the Tilden electors would be largely increased. In closing, your committee declare that the evidence is perfectly conclusive that the State of Florida on the 7th day of November last cast her vote for the Tilden electors. There is no more doubt that the State of Florida cast her vote for the Hayes electors, although not by so large a majority, but still by a majority clear and certain. The extent of the majority is not a fact affecting in the least the rights of those persons to the office to which they were fairly elected, the only material question being, did they have a majority. It appearing that F. C. Humphries, Charles H. Pearce, William H. Holden, and T. W. Long were not elected as presidential electors for the State of Florida, any act done by them in the matter of voting for President and Vice-President of the United States is illegal and void, and no vote cast by them can be counted.

And it appearing by the certificate of Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert Bullock, and Robert B. Hilton, 'the duly elected presidential electors for the State of Florida, that said electors did meet on the first Wednesday of December, A. D. 1876, (being the 6th day of December,) in the capitol at Tallahassee, and give their votes for President and Vice-President of the United States; and did then and there, as such electors, give and cast their votes by ballot for Vice-President of the United States, and did then and there, as such electors, give and cast their votes by ballot for Vice-President of the United States, and four other votes for Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, for Vice-President of the United States, fire votes for Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, States and must be counted.

Your committee recommend the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That at the election held on November 7, A. D. 1876, in the State of Florida, Wilkinson Call, J. E. Yonge, R. B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock were fairly and duly chosen as presidential electors, and that this is shown by the face of the returns and fully substantiated by the evidence of the actual votes cast; and that the said electors having, on the first Wednesday of December, A. D. 1876, cast their votes for Samuel J. Tilden for President and for Thomas A. Hendricks for Vice-President, they are the legal votes of the State of Florida and must be counted as such.

Record and opinion of the supreme court of Florida in the case of the State of Florida ex rel. George F. Drew.

Pleas in the supreme court of the State of Florida, at a special term of said court, held at the capitol, in the city of Tallahassee, in the month of December, A. D. 1876, in a certain cause therein pending, wherein the State of Florida, upon the relation of George F. Drew, was plaintiff, and Samuel B. McLin, secretary of state of the State of Florida, Clayton A. Cowgill, comptroller of public accounts of the State of Florida, and William Archer Cocke, attorney-general of the State of Florida, were defendants.

were defendants.

Be it remembered that on the 13th day of December, A. D. 1876, the relator in the case aforesaid, by Richard L. Campbell, R. B. Hilton, and George P. Raney, his attorneys, filed in open court his petition for a mandamus.

Wherenpon, after reading and considering said petition, an alternative writ of mandamus was awarded, returnable on the 14th day of December, A. D. 1876, which said alternative writ was in the words and figures following, to wit:

Whereupon, after reading and considering said petition, an alternative writ of mandamus was awarded, returnable on the 14th day of December, A. D. 1876, which said alternative writ was in the words and figures following, to wit:

The State of Florida to Samuel B. McLin. secretary of state, William A. Cocke, attorney-general, and Clayton A. Cowgill, comptroller, members of the board of canvassers of Florida, and to every of them greeting:

Whereas it has been suggested to us by the petition of one George F. Drew that a general election was held ou the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, in the several counties of this State, for the election of governor of the State and lieutenant-governor thereof, and for members of the assembly for all the counties of the State, and for senators from the several odd-numbered senatorial districts of the State, and for senators from the several odd-numbered senatorial districts of the State, said election being held in pursuance of law and of proclamation duly made by the secretary of state. At said election, petitioner, George F. Drew, who was and is eligible and qualified to hold the office of governor of said State, was a candidate to be voted for by the voters of said State to fill said office, and that besides himself one Marcellus L. Stearns was a candidate or candidates oved for to fill the same. That by the returns of the said election received at the office of the secretary of state, and now on file in said office, the whole number of votes cast at said election for said George F. Drew were 24,613 votes, and the whole number of public accounts, constituting board of State canvassers of elections, assembled, convened, and organized as such board at the office of the secretary of state on the 27th day of November, A. D. 1876, to canvass the votes of said State given at the said election for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and for governor and licentenant-governor of Florida, and for members of the Congress of the United States and members of th

In the papers received by the secretary of state and purporting to be election returns of said election, and after ascertaining that they appear to be gentine, to declare the result of said election as abown by said returns.

That the said board of State canvassers, or a majority of them, pretend that they have already concluded, completed, and performed the canvass of the said votes cast at the said election for governor and leutenant governor and members of the said votes cast at the said election for governor and leutenant governor and members of the said state of the said state of the said election for the counties of Jackson, Mantaee, Hamilton, and Monroe; that their said pretended canvass of the returns from said counties, if any such has been made, which he does not admit, is a multiply; as is their state, cast at said election for said efficients.

That by reason of the failure and refused of the several counties of the State cast at said election for said efficients.

That by reason of the failure and refused of the said secretary of state, and mon the completion of the said canvass and count and enumerate all the votes of all the counties of the State cast at said election for said early and the said secretary of state, and mon the completion of the said canvass and count and enumerate the votes of the said counties of Jackson, Hamilton, Manatee, and Monroe, as shown by the returns of said election on the in said office of the secretary of the said secretary of state, and Monroe, as shown by the returns of said election on the in said office of the secretary of the said secretary of the said secretary of said election on the said secretary of the said office, that the said Draw was and has been elected to said office, and the said returns of the votes cast in said counties of the State, it would manifestly thave appeared, and would manifestly appear, that the said Draw was and has been elected to said office. The said office of the said election, and there would manifestly have appeared, and would man premises, unless it be afforded by the interposition of this court through writ of mandamus.

Wherefore your petitioner, the said George F. Drew, prays that the writ of mandamus may be issued by this court and directed to the said Samuel B. McLin, secretary of state, the said William Archer Cocke, attorney-general, and the said Clayton A. Cowgill, comptroller of public accounts, commanding them forthwith to meet, and convene, and re-assemble, as a board of State canvassers, in the office of the secretary of state, to canvass and count all the election returns on file in said office of said secretary of state of the election for the office of governor held on the 7th day of November, 1876; and that as such board of State canvassers they do canvass and count the election returns for the said office from each and every of the counties of this State wherein an election was held for said office; and, especially, that they do canvass and count the said election returns from the said conties of Jackson, Hamilton, Manatee, and Monroe; and that they do determine from a canvass, and count, and enumeration of all the votes cast for the said office of governor at said election in all the counties of the State, as shown by the election returns; of said election as received at the office of the secretary of state, who has been elected by the highest number of votes to the said office of governor as shown by said returns; and that they do as such board make and sign a certificate, as required by law, containing in words written at full length the whole number of votes given at said election as shown by said returns for the said office of governor of said State; and that they do as such board make and sign a certificate, as required by law, containing in words written at full length the whole number of votes given at said election as shown by said returns for the said office of governor of said State; and that such other order may be had in the premises as justice may require.

Now, therefore, we, being willing that full and s of State canvassers, in the office of the secretary of state, to canvass and count all the election returns on file in the said office of the secretary of state of the said election for the office of governor, held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, and that as such board of State canvassers you canvass and count the election returns for the said office from each and every of the counties of this State wherein an election was held for said office; and, especially, that you do canvass and count the election returns from the said counties of Jackson, Hamilton, Manatee, and Monroe, and that you do determine from a canvass and count and enumeration, and tabulation of all the votes cast for the said office of governor at said election received at the office of the State, as shown by the election returns of said election received at the office of the secretary of state, who has been elected by the highest number of votes to the said office of governor as shown by said returns; and that you do as such board make and sign a certificate, as required by law, containing, in words and figures written at full length, the whole number of votes given at said effection, as shown by the said returns, for the said office of governor of the State of Florida, and the number of votes given for each person voted for for said office, and in said certificate declare the result of the said election for governor of said State, so that you show cause why you have not done so before our supreme court, at the capitol in Tallahassee, at eleven o'clock a. m. on the 14th day of December, A. D. 1876; and have you then there this writ.

Witness the Hon E. M. Randall, chief-justice of the supreme court of Florida, at Tallahassee, this 13th day of December, A. D. 1876, and the seal of said court.

FRED. T. MYERS,

Clerk of the Supreme Oout of Florida.

And thereafter, to wit, on the 14th day of December, A. D. 1876, the said alternative writ having been returned, duly served upon the said defendants, it was ordered by the court that the issues in this cause be made up by Saturday morning next, the 16th day of December.

Upon which said day the said defendants, McLin and Cowgill, by their attorney, J. P. C. Emmons, and the said defendant, William Archer Cocke, in person, filed their answers to the said writ in the words and figures following, to wit:

In the supreme court of the State of Florida.—Special term, December, 1876.

In the supreme court of the State of Florida.—Special term, December, 1876.

In the matter of the petition of George F. Drew for and the alternate writ of mandamus commanding Samuel B. McLin, secretary of state; William A. Cocke, attorney-general, and Clayton A. Cowgill, comptroller, members of the board of canvassers of Florida, to re-assemble as a board of State canvassers and count all the election returns on file in said office in said secretary of state of election for the office of governor, held on the 7th day of November, 1876; and that as such board of State canvassers they do canvass and count the election returns for said office from each and every of the counties of this State wherein an election was held for said office, and especially that they do canvass and count the said election returns from the said counties of Jackson, Hamilton, Manatee, and Monroe; and that they do determine, from the canvass, and count, and enumeration of all the votes cast for the said office of governer at said election in all the counties of the State, as shown by the election returns of said election as recorded at the office of the secretary of state, who has been elected by the highest number of votes to the office of governor as shown by said returns; and that they do as such board make and sign a certificate as required by law:

To the honorable the supreme court of the State of Florida:

The said Samuel B. McLin and Clayton A. Cowgill ask leave to say that they

The said Samuel B. McLin and Clayton A. Cowgill ask leave to say that they protest and aver now and at all times that this honorable court has no jurisdiction in the premises as set forth in the alternate writ issued in this matter, and cannot grant what the petitioner therein prays for and which said alternate writ commands to be done, unless good reasons are shown why they should not be called upon to act as commanded.

But for a progret there are a commanded to the processory to answer the same and the processory to answer the same are the processory to answer the same and the processory to answer the processory to an actual processory to be processory to an actual processory to a processory to a processory to a processory to be processory to a processory to a processory to a processory to be processory to be processory to an actual processory to be processory to a processory to be proce upon to act as commanded.

But for answer thereunto, or to so much thereof as is necessary to answer unto, the said Samuel B. McLin and Clayton A. Cowgill, two of the respondents in said matter, for themselves jointly and severally, pray leave to say:

That they admit that there was an election held on the 7th day of November, 1876, as set forth in said alternate writ, and that the persons to be voted for at said election were as therein set forth. And they further admit that the said George F. Drew was eligible as alleged, and that there were no other candidates for the office of governor except the said George F. Drew and Marcelius L. Stearns as alleged; but that, according to the best recollection of these respondents, there were 2 or 3 scattering votes cast at said election for persons other than those hereinbefore named as candidates for the office of governor.

But they deny that, as appears by the returns of the said election received at and on file in the office of the secretary of state, that the true vote cast at said election for George F. Drew was 24,613, and that the true vote cast for said Marcellus L. Stearns was 24,116.

And these respondents, further answering, say that they, with the said William Stearns was 24,116.

And these respondents, further answering, say that they, with the said William Archer Cocke, did convene and organize as a board of State canvassers at the office of the secretary of state on the said 27th day of November, 1876, and did proceed to canvass the returns from all the counties in which an election had been held, and continued said canvass until the said board had canvassed and passed upon returns from all the counties in said State, and did ascertain from such canvass of the returns from all the counties in said State the true vote cast at said election for each and every of the persons voted for at said election, and did declare the result thereof and certify the same as required by the law providing for the holding and conduct of said election, as required by the law of said State as enacted in 1868 and as finally amended in 1872, which said law was in force at the time of and during the holding and conduct of said election, and is still in force now and at the time of the filing of the petition and the issuance of the writ herein now being answered unto.

the filing of the petition and the issuance or the write herein less than 1000.

And that said canvass of the said several returns was fully completed and ended on the early morning, to wit, at the hour of about half past one o'clock of the 6th day of December, 1876, and the said board by its unanimous vote so declared; and that nothing remained to be done thereafter to complete the entire labors of said board but the preparation of the proper certificate of the result thereof as had been ascertained, and the preparation of which certificate the board unanimously directed its clerk to prepare, which was thereafter done and signed by these respondents, and duly filed in the office of the secretary of state, these respondents constituting a majority of said board. That board then adjourned without day.

And these respondents, further answering, say that they deny that in the canvass aforesaid, in the ascertainment of the result of said election, in making up and certifying to the same as required by said law of 1868, they were guilty of any usurpation whatever.

certifying to the same as required by said law of 1868, they were guilty of any usurpation whatever.

And these respondents, further answering, say that in relation to the said county of Manatee it appeared from the return of said county, and from evidence received by said board, that the said return was so irregular, and false, and fraudulent that said board was mable to determine the true vote for any officer or member voted for at said election, and said board so certified; and they did not include such return in their determination and declaration in the said certificate of the result of said election hereinbefore referred to.

And these respondents, further answering, say that, as to the counties of Jackson, Hamilton, and Monroe, it was shown by evidence that the returns therefrom were severally false and fraudulent, and that the board determined from the evidence, with reference to each of said counties, what the true vote therein was for each officer and member voted for at such election; and the result of such determination was acted upon in declaring the result of said election and certifying thereto as aforesaid.

And these respondants, further answering, say that in the action that was had by said board, as aforesaid, as to the counties of Hamilton and Monroe, the vote of said board was unanimous; and in the action in relation to Jackson County the action was by a majority of said board.

And, further, that as to the said counties—Manatee, Jackson, Hamilton, and Monroe—showing was made and evidence received from both parties and unanimously acted upon by said board.

And these respondents, further answering, say that as to that part of the suggestion as contained in said writ that said Drew is entirely without remedy except through the intervention of this honorable court by its writ of mandamus, they respectfully submit that each and every of the officers and members voted for at such election have full, perfect, and ample remedy, the former through the courts of law by relation in the nature of quo warranto, and the latter by and through the respective branches of the Legislature to which they may claim to have been duly and legally elected; and that any action which might be ordered by this honorable court through the writ prayed for would have no legal effect upon either forum who might, in the pursuit of the proper remedy, be called upon to act.

And these respondents further respectfully submit to this honorable court that said board having canvassed all the returns from all the counties in said State in which an election was held on the said 7th day of November, and determined and declared who had been elected to any office or member by the true vote cast at said election, and made and signed the certificate required by law in such case made and provided, and adjourned without day, that its powers as a board cease.

THE STATE OF FLORIDA EX REL. GEORGE F. DREW

Samuel B. McLin, Secretary of State, C. A. Cowgill, comptroller of public accounts, and Wm. Archer Cocke, attorney-general for the State of Florida.

Cooke, attorney-general for the State of Florida.

The separate answer of Wm. Archer Cooke to an application before the supreme court of the State of Florida for a writ of mandamus against the said S. B. McLin, C. A. Cowgill, and your respondent, the said William Archer Cooke, filed by George F. Drew and others.

The said respondent answers and says that he neither denies nor assents to the statements of law set forth in the said paper asking the intervention of the writ of mandamus against the members of said canvassing board. Your respondent further states that the charge of rejecting the votes of Manatee, Hamilton, Monroe, and Jackson Counties is not applicable to him in conducting the canvass for the election of State officers which occurred in this State on the 7th of November 11time.

the election of State omeers which occurred in the votes in the counties aforesaid should have been counted, and he so indicated by his vote as a member of the State canvassing board.

This respondent, further answering, disclaims that he has usurped power as a member of said board, or advised others so to do. But, in relation to the allegations in the petition for a mandamus to the contrary notwithstanding, he avers that he has followed the law in all respects, and submits the questions of law involved in this case to the honorable court.

WM. ARCHER COCKE,

WM. ARCHER COCKE, Attorney-General and ex oficio member of the State Canvassing Board of Florida.

Whereupon the said relator, by his attorneys, moved to strike out the answer of the said defendants, McLin and Cowgill, "because the same is evasive, argumentative, and uncertain and insufficient, and does not state facts so that a judgment of the court can be founded thereon."

Whereupon, after a hearing of the parties, the following order was made by the court.

court:

The motion to strike from the files the answer of the respondents, Cowgill and McLin, having been argued and submitted, it is considered by the court that as to the rejection by the respondents, as State canvassers, of the election returns or the papers purporting to be returns from any county, the answer be amended, so as to set forth and show the specific causes and grounds for such rejection, and the defects existing in such returns; and also, that, as to the rejection by the said respondents, as such convassers, of any portion of the votes included in any return from any county, the answer be amended so as to set forth the specific causes and grounds of such rejection in each and every of the instances of such rejection; and that the amendments be made and filed by Monday, the 18th instant, at twelve o'clock at noon.

And thereafter, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, the said respondents, Cowgill and McLin, by their attorney, filed an amended return herein, which is in the words and figures following, to wit:

In supreme court, special term, December, 1876.

GEORGE F. DREW vs.

Samuel B. McLin et al.

SAMUEL B. MCLIN ET AL.

And these respondents, the said McLin and Cowgill, in compliance with the order of this honorable court, make these amendments to the return filed to the alternate writ of mandamus issued herein.

And say that said board did not include the return from said county of Manatee in its determination and declaration of the vote cast at said election, upon the ground of irregularity and fraud in the conduct of the election on the said 7th day of November, 1876.

And these respondents further say that in the county of Clay 29 votes were added to the vote cast for George F. Drew and 6 votes were added to the vote cast for Marcellus L. Stearns, upon the ground that said votes had been improperly rejected by the county canvassers of the vote of said county at said election.

And further, in relation to said county of Clay, that 4 votes cast for George F. Drew at said election were deducted, and 2 cast for Marcellus L. Stearns were deducted, upon the ground that said votes were cast by non-residents of the county. And these respondents further say that in relation to the county of Hamilton, the vote of precinct No. 2 was deducted from the vote cast in said county as appeared from the returns, upon the ground of gross violation of the election law and fraud in the conduct of the election.

These respondents further say that 5 votes were deducted from the vote cast in Hernando County as appeared from the returns therefrom, upon the ground that said votes were illegally cast.

And these respondents further say that 557 votes were deducted from the vote cast in the county of Jackson as appeared from the face of the return, upon the ground of irregularity and gross fraud in the conduct of said election.

These respondents further say that 2 votes were deducted from the vote cast in the county of Jackson as appeared from the face of the return, upon the ground of irregularity and gross fraud in the conduct of said election.

Leon County as apparent upon the face of the return, upon the ground that said votes were illegal.

And these respondents further say that the board deducted from the vote cast in the county of Jefferson, as appeared from the return, 61 votes, upon the ground that said 61 votes were fraudulently cast.

And these respondents further say that 7 votes were deducted from the vote cast in the county of Orange, upon the ground that said votes were illegally cast.

And these respondents further say that the vote of one precinct in the county of Monroe was deducted from the vote, as appeared from the return from said county, upon the ground of irregularity in the conduct of the election and fraud in the conduct of the inspectors of said election in said precinct.

W. M. McINTOSH,

J. P. C. EMMONS of Counsel for Respondents.

And these respondents, further answering, say, as to the said county of Manatee, that said board did not include the vote cast in said county as it appeared on the face of the return, upon the ground that it appeared in evidence that there was such irregularity and fraud in the conduct of the election in said county in receiving votes of persons not registered, and there being no registration-list furnished inspectors, and no designation of voting-places, and no notice of election, that said board could not ascertain the true vote.

J. P. C. EMMONS, Counsel for Respondents.

And upon the same day came the relator, by his attorneys, and filed his demurrer to the answer of the respondents, in the words and figures following, to wit:

Supreme court of Florida, December special term, A. D. 1876.

STATE OF FLORIDA EX REL. GEORGE F. DREW PS.
SAMUEL B. McLin et als. SAMUEL B. McLIN ET ALS,

The relator, George F. Drew, demurs to the answer of the respondents, McLin and Cowgill, as amended, on the ground that the same is insufficient in law.

Points of demurrer.

First. The board of State canvassers could not lawfully exclude or reject the county returns or votes from the county of Manatee, or the precinct returns or votes from the other counties stated in the answer to have been excluded or rejected, upon the grounds stated in said return or answer, nor could they legally make any addition of votes to any returns, as stated in said answer.

Second. The said answer shows that said board illegally excluded the return from the county of Manatee, and made the additions to and deductions from the votes as they appear by the returns from the other counties mentioned in their said answer.

Third. The adjournment of the board before having made a legal canvass of the votes of the several counties, as shown by the returns therefrom, is no reason in law why they should not re-assemble and canvass the votes of the several counties as they appear upon the face of the returns, Fourth. The allegation in the said answer that each of the officers and members voted for at said election has his remedy, as therein stated, is no sufficient reason in law why the relator should not have his remedy in the premises by mandamus.

R. L. CAMPBELL, R. B. HILTON, GEO. P. RANEY,

For Relator.

We certify that the above demurrer is, in our opinion, well founded in law, and we further say it is not interposed for delay.

And after hearing of the parties by their attorneys, and argument of the said demurrer, and upon the 22d day of December, A. D. 1876, the court read its opinion herein, which said opinion is in the words and figures following, to wit:

THE STATE OF FLORIDA ON THE RELATION OF GEORGE F DREW

Samuel B. McLin, Secretary of State, Clayton A. Cowgill, comptroller, and William Archer Cocke, attorney-general of the State of Florida. Mandamus.

WESTCOTT, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

Westcott, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The view that the board of State canvassers is a tribunal having power strictly judicial, such as is involved in the determination of the legality of a particular vote or election, cannot be sustained. The constitution of this State (article 3, and section 1 of article 6) provides that "the powers of the government of the State of Florida shall be divided into three departments: legislative, executive, and judicial; and no person properly belonging to one of the departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others except on those cases expressly provided for by this constitution.

"The judicial power of the State shall be vested in a supreme court, circuit court, county courts, and justices of the peace."

All of the acts which this board can do under the statute must be based upon the returns; and while in some cases the officers composing the board may, like all ministerial officers of similar character, exclude what purports to be a return for irregularity, still everything they are authorized to do is limited to what is sanctioned by authentic and true returns before them. Their final act and determination must be such as appears from and is shown by the returns from the several counties to be correct. They have no general power to issue subpeans, to summon parties, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to grant a trial by jury, or to do any act but determine and declare who has been elected as shown by the returns. They are authorized to enter no judgment, and their power is limited by the express words of the statute which gives them being to the signing of a certificate containing the vhole number of votes given for each person for each office, and therein declaring the result as shown by the returns. This certificate thus signed is not a judicial judgment, and the determination of a right after notice, according to the general law of the land as to the rights of parties, but it is a declaration of a conclusion limited and restr the exception of the courts in Louisiana, and perhaps another State, no judicial sanction can be found for the view that these officers are judicial in their character or that they have any discretion, either executive, legislative, or judicial, which is not bound and fixed by the returns before them.

The duty to count these returns has been enfored by mandamus so repeatedly in the courts of the several States of the Union that the power of the courts in this respect has long since ceased to be an open question. Mr. Justice Smith, in the very celebrated case of The Attorney-General ex ret. Bashford vs. Barstow, (4 Wis., Sl3.) when speaking of the powers of the board of State canvassers, after reciting their power to "determine" the result of an election from the returns, says: "These are not judicial but purely ministerial acts." We must, therefore, decide that the general nature of the power given by the statute is ministerial, and that to the extent that any strictly and purely judicial power is granted, such power cannot exist.

This brings us to the consideration of the only remaining general question as to the powers of the board under the statute.

While the general powers of the board are thus limited to and by the returns, still as to these returns the statute provides that, "if any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any officer or member, they shall so certify and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration, and the secretary of state shall preserve and file in his office all such returns, together with such other documents and papers as may have been received by him or by said board of canvassers." The words true vote here indicate the vote actually cast, as distinct from the legal vote. This follows, first, from the clear general duty of the canvassers, which is to ascertain and certify the "votes given" for each person for each office, and, second, because to dete and, second, because to determine whether a vote cast is a legal vote is beyond the power of this board. As to the words "irregular, false, and fraudulent" in this connection, their definition is not required by the questions raised by the pleadings in this case.

The properties have not alleged that they have before them any return "so irregular, false, or fraudulent" that they are mable to determine the actual vote cast in any county, as shown by the returns; and nothing can be clearer than that the counting of returns audiciently regular to ascertain the whole number of votes given and signing a certificate are merely ministerial acts. Under these pleadings the genuineness and regularity of the particular returns in question here are considered and signing a certificate are merely ministerial acts. Under these pleadings the genuineness and regularity of the particular returns in question here are is that a return of the character named shall not be included in the determination and declaration of the board; and that it has power to determine the boars flat character of the returns deadors in the state of the returns deadors and the state of the returns deadors and the state of the returns deadors and the return of the votes embraced in a return and to count others embry and the state of the returns deadors and the returns the returns the state of the returns deadors and the return deadors are the returns and the count of the returns that it is not respect to the returns deadors and the return and the count of the returns that the powers here conferred are ministerial powers. It is true that it is not respect to the return and the count of the return and the count of the return and the count of the return and the return and the count of the return and the count of the return and the count of the return and the return are powers which necessarily appertain to the discharge of every ministerial powers. It is true that the powers have the return and the return are included in the country of the return and the re

As to the county of Jackson:

As to the county of Jackson:

The answer sets up that 557 votes were deducted from the votes cast in the county of Jackson, as appeared from the face of the return, upon the ground of irregularity and gross fraud in the conduct of the election.

Upon the face of this answer, and in view of the express allegations of the alternative writ as to the genuineness, intelligibility, and bona fide character of the returns of the votes cast in this county, and in view of the express admission by the pleadings that such return was a genuine return of votes cast, the only question raised here is whether, under this statute, the canvassers can reject a return of votes cast, or any of the votes cast, for irregularity or fraud in the conduct of the election.

election. Whether irregularities or fraud in an election will authorize the rejection of a vote cast, counted, and returned in a genuine bona fide return, is a question of law, not within the power of this board to determine. If the return was regular, genuine, and bona fide, as it was admitted to be by the pleadings, it was the duty of the ine, and bona fide board to count it.

As to the county of Hamilton:

The answer alleges that there was a deduction made from the votes cast at one precinct, as appeared from the face of the return, upon the ground of gross violation of the election law and fraud in the conduct of the election. What has been said as to Jackson County covers this case, and there is no necessity for repetition

As to the county of Monroe:

As to the county of Monroe:

The answer alleges that the vote at one precinct was deducted from the vote as appeared from the return from said county, upon the ground of irregularity in the conduct of the election and fraud in the conduct of the inspectors of said election at said precinct. What has been said covers the matter of irregularity in the election. As to fraud in the conduct of inspectors at a precinct, it is not a ground upon which the canvassers can reject a return from the county which is genuine and bona fide. What is fraud in such an inspector is a question of law, so also the question whether such fraud by inspectors can vitiate an election is a question of law. Both are judicial questions, beyond the power of the board to determine.

As to the county of Manates:

As to the county of Manatee:

As to the county of Manatee:

The answer sets up that said board did not include the return from said county of Manatee in its determination and declaration of the vote cast at said election, upon the ground of irregularity and frand in the conduct of the election on said rady of November, 1876. The matter of irregularity and frand here alleged has already been considered in the case of other counties.

The answer alleges further as to this county, that the board did not include the vote cast therein, as it appeared on the face of the return, because it appeared in evidence that there was such irregularity and fraud in the conduct of the election in said county in receiving votes of persons not registered, and there being no registration-list furnished inspectors, and no designation of voting-places, and no notice of election, that said board could not ascertain the true vote.

A return of votes cast in a county at a general election, of which notice is given throughout the State by the proper executive authority, no notice of election by local officers (county) having been given, is not a return either irregular, false, or fraudulent, within the meaning of the statute regulating and defining the powers and duties of the State canvassers.

Like the question of the legality of a vote, this is a question of law to be determined by a court—a judicial question beyond the power and jurisdiction of a ministerial officer under the law, constitutional and statutory. A return of votes cast in a county at such general election, duly signed by acknowledged county officers, and regular in form, of which election no notice by county officers as to polling places is given, (the time of election being according to the general notice) is a return which the State canvassers must count, as it is neither irregular, false, nor fraudulent within the meaning of the statute. Whether such vote is effective to vest the office is a question judicial in its character, which this court upon mandamus should no more determine the har hould

As to the counties of Hernando, Orange, and Leon:

The answer states that a number of votes were deducted from the returns of votes cast in said counties because they were illegally cast, and that a vote was deducted from the return of Jefferson County because it was fraudulently cast. These, as we have before said, are questions which the law does not authorize the board to determine. They must count these returns as they admit them by the pleadings to be returns within the meaning of the statute. They nowhere allege the returns to be so "irregular, false, or fraudulent" that they cannot determine the vote cast from them.

As to the county of Clay:

As to the county of Clay:

The answer states that 35 votes were added upon the ground that said votes had been improperly rejected by the county canvassers of the vote of said county at said election, and that 6 votes cast were deducted upon the ground that said votes were cast by non-residents of the county. It follows from the view we have taken of the law applicable to the powers and duties of the State canvassers, that any statement of votes by precinct inspectors, which were not included in the canvass made by the county canvassing board, cannot be counted by the State board, the powers of the latter being confined by law to counting only such votes as are duly returned by the county board. Such votes cannot be legally included in the estimates of the State canvassing board.

The question of jurisdiction raised in the pleadings, as well as the other questions of practice and power, are all adjudicated in the case of the State on the relation of Bloxam vs. The Board of State Canvassers, 13 Fla., 74, 5-6, and it is unnecessary to repeat here what is there said.

Under the pleadings, and the constitution and the statute as applied to them, our judgment is that the demurrer must be sustained and the peremptory writ must be awarded.

our judgment is that the demurrer must be sustained and the peremptory with must be awarded.

Whereupon the said respondents, Cowgill and McLin, by their attorney, made and entered a motion herein in the words and figures following, to wit:

And the said respondents, McLin and Cowgill, come and move the court to file an amended return to the alternative writ issued in this case, setting forth among other things the character of the returns mentioned therein, as the same appear upon the face therof.

And afterward, to wit, on the 23d day of December, A. D. 1876, the said motion having been withdrawn, the judgment of the court herein was entered in the words and figures following:

STATE OF FLORIDA ON THE RELATION OF GEORGE F. DREW, plaintiff,

SAMUEL B. MCLIN, SECRETARY OF STATE, WILLIAM ARCHER Cocke, attorney-general, and Clayton A. Cowgill, comptroller of the State of Florida, respondents.

This day came the parties, by their attorneys, and thereupon the matters of law arising upon the relator's demurrer to the answers, original and amended of the respondents, being argued, it seems to the court that he said answers and the matter therein contained are not a sufficient answer in law to the alternative writ issued herein, and that said return is insufficient. Therefore it is considered that a peremptory writ be awarded, directed to the said Samuel B. McLin, secretary of state. William Archer Cocke, attorney-general, and Clavton A. Cowgill, comptroller, board of canvassers of election of the State of Florida, commanding them that they forthwith meet and convens and re-assemble as a board of State canvassers in the office of the secretary of state, to canvass and count all election returns on file in the said office of the secretary of state of the said election for the office of governor, held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, and that as such board of State canvassers they "canvass and count the returns for said office from each and every of the counties of this State, wherein an election was held for said office, and especially, that they do canvass and count the said election returns from the said counties of Jackson, Hamilton, Manatee, and Monroe, and that they determine from a canvass and count and examination and tabulation of all the votes cast for said office of governor at said election received at the office of the State, as shown by the election returns of said election received at the office of the secretary of state, who has been elected by the highest number of votes to the said office of governor, as shown by the said returns, and that they do, as such board, make and sign a certificate, as required by law, containing in words and figures, written at Ill length, the whole number of votes given at said election as shown by said returns for the said office of governor of the State of Florida, and the number of votes given for each person voted for for said office, and in said certificate declare the result of the said election for governor of the said State.

And that they do perfectly execute this writ on or before the 27th day of December, A. D. 1876, and how they shall have executed it make return to our supreme cont on that day by four o'clock p. m. in writing, to be filed in the clerk's office of s ber, A. D. 1876, and how they shall have executed it make return to our supreme court on that day by four o'clock p. m. in writing, to be filed in the clerk's office of said court.

The section of the statute defining the powers and duties of the board of canvassers which the court construed in this case is as follows:

SEC. 4. On the thirty-fifth day after the holding of any general or special election for any State officer, member of the Legislature, or Representative in Congress, or sooner if the returns shall have been received from the several counties wherein elections shall have been held, the secretary of state, attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall meet at the office of the secretary of state, pursuant to notice to be given by the secretary of state, and form a board of State canvassers, and proceed to canvass the returns of said election, and determine and declare who shall have been elected to any such office, or as such member, as shown by such returns. If any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shalls occurrify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration; and the secretary of state shall preserve and file in his office all such returns, together with such other documents and papers as may have been received by him or by said board of canvassers. The said board shall make and sign a certificate, containing, in words written at full length, the whole number of votes given for each office, the number of votes given for each person for each office, and for member of the Legislature, and therein declare the result, which certificate shall be recorded in the office of the secretary of state in a book to be kept for that purpose, and the secretary of state shall cause a certified copy of such certificate to be pub

Westcorr, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court propose not only to dispose of the motion in this case made and submitted this morning, but also to announce our views in reference to the whole subject-matter of what is called a return to the peremptory writ in this cause.

The first and only general question involved in this whole matter is, What is in form and substance the legal and proper paper to be filed by a respondent in response to a peremptory writ of mandamus?

The second question is, Have the respondents complied with the law in this response to a peremptory writ of mandamus?

The second question is, Have the respondents complied with the law in this respect?

The third question is, In case they have or have not complied with the law, what is the proper order to be made by the court in this behalf?

To the first question, What is the legal and proper paper to be filed by a respondent in response to a peremptory writ of mandamus? Upon this question there is no conflict in the authorities. "There is strictly no return to a peremptory writ. It is to be obeyed, and a certificate is made of what has been done." This is the language of Mr. Justice Woodward in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of Iowa, (9 Iowa, 335.) and such is the view announced by all the courts. English and American, so far as the cases decided by them upon the subject have been examined by us. (Tapp. on Man. 61, 389, 445, and 456.) The granting "a peremptory writ implies that the party has been fully heard, and therefore he can allege no reason why he has not obeyed it." Such is the language of Chief-Justice Ruffin, of the supreme court of North Carolina, in the case of The State vs. Robert Jones et al. (I Ired., 414.) If such be the necessary inference, and in this case such inference corresponds with the fact, for the parties have been fully heard, then the pleadings, so far as the propriety of granting the writ is concerned, and as to matters of defense to the action proper, are closed, and the necessary result is that no such matter can be considered or be made the subject-matter of any response to this peremptory writ.

We have to apply these plain, simple principles of law to what here purports to be a response to the peremptory writ. The first paper which we have on file connected with what purports to be a "return" to the writ is the certificate which constitutes the evidence and statement of a canvass made by the board of State canvassers of votes cast at a general election held in this State on the 7th of November, A. D. 1876. The statute regulating this sub law imposes upon him, and it should be on the files of his office as evidence of the fact that the certificate recorded and published by him is a correct capy of the original, and that his duty in this respect has been properly discharged. As to this paper, therefor, it is improperly and illegally on the files of this court to send it as it is the manifest duty of this office to receive and tile it. Therefore it is the order of the court that the clerk of this correct with paper, therefore it is the order of the court that the clerk of this correct with paper received to transmit to said officer at the same time a certified copy of so much of this opinion as refers to the proper place of deposit of this certificate.

The second paper on file connected with what purports to be a "return" is what is called a "protest" of the respondents Cowgill and McLin. This court is mot, and should not be, offended at the filling of any respectful and proper protest for the protest of the protest of the protest will always, when so filed, receive that anthorize such action. Such protest will always, when so filed, receive that the hands of this court. In this case, the matter of jurisdiction which this "protest" proposes again to raise was made the subject of defense by the respondents Cowgill and McLin. We have heard them fully. We have determined that we have jurisdiction. It is our duty to enforce it. It is the duty of the respondents to of defense as to which these parties have been already heard, it is not properly here. We cannot hear further argument as to this matter. We cannot hear further argument as to this matter. We cannot hear further argument as to this matter. We cannot hear further argument as to this matter. We cannot hear further argument as to this matter. We cannot hear further argument as to this matter. We cannot hear further argument as to this matter. We cannot hear further argument as to this matter. We cannot hear further argument as a so which the major and the supple duty of the respondents is to o

At a supreme court for the State of Florida, continued and held at the capitol, in the city of Tallahassee, pursuant to adjournment, on Tuesday, the second day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven. the State of Florida.

And now, on reading and filing the certificate of the respondents, under date of January 1, 1877, and the additional certificate of the respondents, filed this day, and the relator not objecting, it is considered by the court that the said respondents have substantially complied with the mandate of this court in this behalf. But because the respondents have incorporated in their said certificate a detailed statement of votes cast in the several counties at the late election, which said detailed statement was not required by the order of this court, and with which this court in this proceeding has no concern; and in the making and incorporating such statement in their said certificate, the said respondents have unnecessarily encumbered the record of this court with matter not pertinent or material; it is therefore ordered by this court, of its own motion, that all such detailed statements be, and the same is, hereby quashed and struck out, leaving and saving the rest and residue of said response to stand as a substantial compliance with the requirements of the law as to the matter before this court. It is further considered and adjudged that the respondents Samuel B. McLin and Clayton A. Cowgill pay the costs of this proceeding.

I, Fred. T. Myers, clerk supreme court of Florida, do hereby certify that the above is a true extract from the minutes of said court, and a correct copy of the final order in the case of George F. Drew vs. The Board of State Canvassers for Florida.

EXHIBIT No. 53.

STATE OF FLORIDA, Baker County:

Baker County:

Be it known that, on the 10th day of November, A. D. 1876, that the following notice commanding respectively M. F. Coxe, clerk of the circuit court in and for Baker County, and John Dorman, a justice of the peace in and for said county, to be and appear at the village of Sanderson for the purpose of canvassing the votes polled at an election held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, in said county, when a President, Vice-President of the United States, and a governor and lieutenant-governor of the State of Florida, and a member of the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States, and a member of the General Assembly of the State of Florida, and constables in and for Baker County were voted for; that said notices were in words and figures as follows:

Sanderson Florida.

SANDERSON, FLORIDA, November 10, 1876.

M. J. COXE, Clerk of the Court:

Meet me at Sanderson on Monday, November 13, 1876, to canvass the vote of Baker E. W. DRIGGERS County Judge. Sanderson, Fla, November 14, 1876.

JOHN DORMAN, Justice of the Peace, Baker County:

OHN DORMAN.

Justice of the Peace, Baker County:

Meet me at Sanderson November 13, 1876, to canvass the vote of Baker County.

E. W. DRIGGERS,

Judge Probate.

That on Monday, 13th November, A. D. 1876, M. J. Coxe, clerk as aforesaid, and John Dorman, justice of the peace as aforesaid, did respond to said notice in their own proper person, and were willing, prepared, and desirous of canvassing the said votes polled at the election aforesaid; that immediately upon the arrival of the said Coxe and the said Dorman, that E. W. Driggers, judge of probate of said county of Baker, and author of the notices above written, and A. A. Allen, sheriff of said-county of Baker, did at once absent themselves from said village of Sanderson, and by such absence did prevent the organization of the board of canvassers of said county; that every effort was made to secure their presence, but without avail; that the said Coxe and the said Dorman remained in the village of Sanderson the entire day, hoping for the return of one or both of such officers, that the convass might proceed according to law; that said Driggers and said Allen were absent for some hours, and did not return until three or four o'clock, p. m.; that immediately upon their return the said clerk did, in the presence of said Dorman, request the judge of probate to aid them in the organization of the board of canvassers and to proceed to make the canvass of said vote polled as aforesaid, and that the said Driggers, judge of probate as aforesaid, positively refused to participate in the canvass; that upon his refusal the said Allen, sheriff as aforesaid, was requested to act and positively refused to act as one of the board of canvassers; that after both officers whose duty under the law it was to have aided in said canvass had positively declined to do so, and six days, within the law, requires the canvass to be made having nearly expired, that the said Coxe and the said Dorman did make an earnest effort to procure another justice of the peace to aid them in making the canvass, but were unable to do so, that having failed to procure the aid of an additional justice of the peace, that they, the said Coxe and the said Dorman, proceeded to canvass the said votes.

M. J. COXE, [L. s.]

Clerk Circuit Court, Baker County.

I do certify that I did request E. W. Driggers, judge of probate in and for the county of Baker, to assist in the organization of the board of canvassers to canvass the vote of Baker County polled at the election above mentioned, and that he positively refused to do so. And I certify that on his refusal that I did make the same request of A. A. Allen, sheriff of said county of Baker, to participate in the organization of said board of canvassers and to aid in canvassing the votes polled at the election above mentioned, and that he refused so to do; and the said M. J. Coxe made the same request of them, was likewise refused; and I further certify that the facts set forth above as true.

JOHN DORMAN, [L. S.]
Justice of the Peace in and for the County of Baker.

I, W. D. Bloxham, secretary of state of Florida, do hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of the certificate on file in my office relating to the can vass of the votes of Baker County, in said State, at the late election held for President and Vice-President.

In testimony whereof I hereunto set my hand and cause the great seal of the State to be affixed. Done at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 19th day of January, A. D. 1877.

MINORITY REPORT.

The following are the views of the minority of the committee as subsequently presented:

subsequently presented:

On the 4th day of December last the House of Representatives passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That three special committees, one of fifteen members to proceed to Louisiana, one of six members to proceed to Florida, and one of nine members to proceed to South Carolina, shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate recent elections therein and the action of the returning or canvassing boards in the said States in reference thereto, and to report all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the electors of the said States for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to a fair understanding thereof by the people; and that for the purpose of speedily executing this resolution the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to take testimony, and, at their discretion, to detail subcommittees, with like authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony; and that the said committees and their subcommittees may employ stenographers, clerks, and messengers, and be attended each by a deputy sergeant-at-arms; and said committees shall have leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise."

On the following day the Speaker of the House appointed Messra. Thompson of stenographers, clerks, and messengers, and be attended each by a deputy sergent at arms; and said committees shall have leave to report at any time, by ill or otherwise."

On the following day the Speaker of the House appointed Messrs. Thompson of Massachusetts, De Bolt of Missouri, Walling of Ohio, Hopkins of Pennsylvania, Woodburn of Nevada, and Dunnell of Minnesota the committee to proceed to Florida to investigate the recent election held therein and report the action of the canvassing board of said State.

The committee left the city of Washington on the morning of the 8th of December, and commenced their duties in Tallahassee on Wednesday, the 13th of the month. Hon. S. B. McLin, secretary of the State of Florida, was the first witness. He was examined in regard to the original tabulated statement that was make up on the night of the 5th and morning of the 6th of December by the clerks of the board of State canvasers. This statement is Exhibit 41 in the printed testinony taken by the committee.

To the end that a construction might be given to the resolution under which the committee were appointed and were then beginning to act, Mr. Woodburn offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this committee that under the resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States creating it and defining its duties it is anthorized only to investigate the manner of the election of the electors for President and Vice-President in the State of Florida at the late election, and the action of the returning or canvassing board of said State in reference thereto, and to report to the said House of Representatives all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the said electors of the said State of Florida."

Mr. HOPKINS presented the following resolution as a substitute for the foregoing: "Resolved, That the resolution under which this committee acts is sufficiently explicit as to the powers and duties of the committee, and cannot be limited or restricted by any action of ours."

Adopted.

YEAS—Messrs. De Bolt, Walling, and Hopkins—3.

NAYS—Messrs. Woodburn and Dunnell—2.

The following resolution was then offered by Mr. DUNNELL:

"Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Florida be requested to furnish to this committee certified copies of all documents, affidavits, and other papers furnished him or the canvassing board of the State, and upon which said board acted in determining and declaring who were chosen electors for President and Vice-President of the United States for the said State of Florida at the election held November 7, 1876, and that said copies be made a part of our report to the House of Representatives."

The motion was lost.

YEAS—Messrs. Woodburn and Dunnell—2.

NAYS—Messrs. Woodburn and Dunnell—2.

NAYS—Messrs. De Bolt, Walling, and Hopkins—3.

This action of the majority was to the minority a matter of very great surprise. The committee had been sent to Florida to investigate the recent election in that State, and to report the action of the returning board therein. The character of this action would unmistakably depend upon the evidence which the board had before it when the canvass was made. Frands were charged in this and that county, democratic as well as republican. Irregularities more or less fatal to a fair expression of the will of the people had also been charged. These alleged frauds and irregularities had been accompanied with affidavits and other proofs. The canvassing board had acted upon them, and would have made the canvass in violation of law if it had not done so. The minority desired to know precisely the grounds upon which the board had made its important finding and then judge, whether it acted honestly or otherwise, and whether or not its findings could be sustained by the laws of the State.

This request of the minority for these papers and documents on file in the office of the secretary of state was twice refused by

We submit that the investigation made in Florida was not complete; that the committee do not and cannot report "all the facts" essential to a fair understanding by the people.

When twenty or more precincts are attacked before the State canvassing board and the board acts upon the frauds or irregularities alleged to have been committed therein, being governed by affidavits laid before it and by oral testimony, no one can reasonably contend that an investigation which shall deserve a just consideration can be made by ignoring every particle of evidence upon which the board acted, when but ten of these precincts are inquired into and the other ten shunned as if from fear that disclosures there might overturn the findings in the other ten, who will claim that such an investigation deserves the honor of the name? The want of these documents thus withheld was felt at every step of our investigation, and rendered us unable, in many instances, to make that defense of the canvassing board which it justly deserved. We believed then, as we do now, that the board acted with singular fidelity and the utmost fairness. The majority of that board, in many of the most important and sharply contested cases, relied upon the democratic attorney-general and acted under his advice and with him.

Attorney-General Cocke has been lauded in the democratic press of the country for his great learning and distinguished personal integrity.

We needed and sought the evidence which was deemed sufficient by him and the balance of the board. The majority had the assistance of the chairman of the democratic state committee of Florida and of a democratic lawyer from New York, who were well supplied with copies of papers and ample data touching the different precincts which underwent investigation.

Unable to obtain the affidavits and other papers for our guidance an attempt was made to obtain the minutes of the board made during its final session. We here copy from page 70 of the printed testimony:

WILLIAM LEE APTHORPE sworn and examined.

By Mr. DUNNELL:

Question. What is your name?

Answer. William Lee Apthorpe.
Q. Where do you reside?

A. In Tallahassee, Florida.
Q. State whether or not you were the clerk of the canvassing board of the State of Florida during this late canvass of the electoral and State votes. A. I was.
Q. State whether or not you kept the minutes of the canvassing board.
A. I did.
Q. Have you those minutes in your possession ?

Q. Have you those minutes in your possession?

A. I have.
Q. Will you please read those minutes?
A. The whole of the minutes are pretty voluminous. I have brought the minutes of the first and the last day. The first day's proceedings simply show the organization of the canvassing board and the last day's proceedings the finding of the board.

Mr. Dunnell. Will you now read to the committee the minutes of the final action of the canvassing board? I mean their action upon the contested-election cases passed upon by the board at that final meeting, and upon whose final action the result of the election held November? was proclaimed in the State

The CHAIRMAN. I will simply say that that sufficiently appears from the tabulated statement of the canvassing board and the returns made by the canvassing board on the certificates of the county returns, already in evidence. The reading of the minutes is, therefore, not allowed.

Q. (To the witness.) Do you say that the other minutes are the minutes of testimony?

Q. Affidavits and oral testimony on either side.
Q. Affidavits and oral testimony?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And the organization of the board?
A. Yes, sir.

It is not true that the indorsements on the county returns give the reasons therefor? The grounds upon which the action was taken were our great need. These minutes were of comparatively little value to us in our investigations yet they do give the history of the canvass and the vote of the different members of the board. We here give place to these minutes. They show the action of the canvassing board in each case:

Certified copy of minutes of proceedings of State board of canvassers at their final session, December 5 and 6, 1876.

TUESDAY, December 5-10. a. m.

Board met in private session. It was ordered that those counties which were not contested be first taken up and canvassed.

The following counties were then canvassed according to the face of the returns, namely: Brevard, Bradford, Calhoun, Dade, Escambin, Frankliu, Gadsden, Marion, Putnam, Polk, Santa Rosa, Sumter, Saint Johns, Suwannee, Taylor, Volusia, Wakulas, Walton, and Washington—twenty-four counties.

At two o'clock p. m. the board took a recess until four p. m., at which hour it reassembled and proceeded with the canvass.

BAKER COUNTY

was taken up and canvassed according to the precinct returns by unanimous vote of the board.

CLAY COUNTY.

Twenty-nine votes were added to and 4 illegal votes taken from the democratic electoral and State vote, and 8 votes were added to and 2 illegal votes taken from the republican vote; and with these amendments of the returns the county was canvassed by unanimous vote.

HERNANDO COUNTY.

Five illegal votes were deducted from the democratic electoral vote; and with this deduction the county was canvassed by unanimous vote.

NASSAU COUNTY.

Canvassed according to face of return by unanimous vote.

ORANGE COUNTY.

Seven illegal votes were deducted from the democratic electoral and State vote, and with this deduction the county was canvassed by unanimous vote.

JEFFERSON COUNTY.

Sixty illegal votes were deducted from the republican vote, and with this deduction the county was canvassed by unanimous vote.

LEON COUNTY.

Two illegal votes were deducted from the republican vote, and with this deduction the county was canvassed by unanimous vote.

MANATER COUNTY.

This entire county was thrown out of the canvass on account of the entire absence of any and all legal steps in preparation for the election and in holding the same. The vote stood as follows: The secretary of state and the comptroller for its rejection, and the attorney-general for retaining it.

DUVAL COUNTY.

This county was canvassed by comparing the county return with the several precinct returns, on account of the former not bearing the signature of the county judge. The vote stood: Secretary of state and comptroller for canvassing the county, attorney-general for rejecting it.

county, attorney-general for rejecting it.

HAMILTON COUNTY.

Eighty-three democratic votes and 58 republican which had been illegally added to the electoral vote, on the face of the return, were thrown out. Jasper precinct No. 2, giving 321 votes for George F. Drew and 183 votes for M. L. Stearns, for governor; 322 votes for N. A. Hull and 181 votes for D. Montgomery, for lieutenant-governor; 323 votes for the democratic electors and 185 votes for the republican electors; 320 votes for Jesse J. Finley and 184 votes for H. Bisbee, jr., for Congress; 235 votes for N. J. Patterson and 257 votes for J. Bell, for State senator; 167 votes for J. N. Reid, 255 votes for W. J. J. Duncan, and 29 votes for J. W. Grey, for member of the assembly, was thrown out of the canvass on account of gross violation of the election law by the inspectors in not completing the canvass without adjournment; in allowing unauthorized persons to handle the ballots and assist in the count; in adjourning over night and going to unother place, and in signing returns next day which they had not themselves made or verified and the contents of which they did not know. With these deductions the county was canvassed by unanimous vote.

MONROE COUNTY.

MONROE COUNTY.

Precinct No. 3, Key West, giving 401 votes to the democratic electoral and State tickets and 59 votes to the republican, was thrown out of the canvass on account of gross violation of the election laws by the inspectors in adjourning before the completion of the canvass and completing it the next day in a different place and without public notice. The vote on its rejection was unanimous, the attorney-general deciding in reply to a question put to him as to the legal effect of these violations of the law that it must be thrown out. With this deduction the county was canvassed.

ALACHUA COUNTY.

Seventeen illegal electoral votes (4 republican and 13 democratic) at Waldo precinct were thrown out unanimously. A vote was taken on retaining or throwing out Archer precinct No. 2, and the secretary of state and comptroller voting to retain it and the attorney-general voting to throw it out, it was retained and the county canvassed with the before-mentioned deductions.

JACKSON COUNTY.

Campbellton precinct, giving for the republican electoral and State tickets 77 votes and for the democratic electoral and State tickets 291 votes, were thrown out of the canvass on account of violation of the election laws by the inspectors in removing the ballot-box from the election-room at the adjournment for dinner into an adjoining store and having it there unsealed and concealed from the public during said adjournment; in not counting the ballots at the close of the polls and comparing them with the number of names on the poll-list, and because only 76 republican ballots were counted out of the ballot-box, whereas one hunfired and thirty-three persons swear that they voted the full republican ticket at that poll. The vote of the board was as follows: Secretary of state and comptroller for rejecting it, attorney-general for retaining it.

Friendship Church precinct, giving for the republican electoral and State tickets 44 votes and for the democratic electoral and State tickets 145 votes, was thrown out of the canvass on account of violation of the election laws by the inspectors in placing the ballot-box in such a position as to be out of sight of the voter and of the public; in placing a supervisor at the window to receive the ballots instead of an inspector; in not making and completing the canvass at the polling-place and without adjournment and in view of the public, but in a bed-room two miles away, and in not counting the ballots and comparing them with the number of names on the poll-list. As to this precinct the vote of the board was as follows: The secretary of state and comptroller for rejecting it and the attorney-general for retaining it. With these deductions the county was canvassed.

The list of counties having now been gone through, at a little after twelve o'clock Tuesday night, the board, by unanimous vote, declared the State canvass concluded, and directed the clerk to prepare a certificate of the result. On suggestion of the figures and verify the footings. He introduced Mr. Pasco, who examined and found said footings correct.

The certificate of the electoral vote having been prepared and verified, it was signed by two members of the board, the secretary of state and the comptroller, the attorney-general declining to sign it, saying that he would prepare a protest setting forth his reasons. The board then (at three o'clock on the morning of the 6th) adjourned to allow time for the clerical labor of preparing the certificate of the result of the canvass at large.

This, having been completed and verified, was signed on the 8th December as of date of the 6th, the day when the canvass was completed

WM. LEE APTHORPE,

Clerk of Board of Canvassers.

SAML. B. McLin, Secretary of State and Chairman of Board of Canvassers.

I do hereby certify that the above is a true copy of the minutes of the final session of the State board of canvassers State of Florida, held on the 5th and 6th days of December, A. D. 1876.

WM. LEE APTHORPE, Clerk of Board of Canvassers.

TALLAHASSEE, FLORIDA, December 12, 1876.

Saml. B. McLin, Secretary of State and Chairman Board of State Canvassers.

It has been claimed that the canvassing beard of Florida, in their canvass made in December last, acted in disregard of their former practice as well as against law. We here allude to Senate Report No. 611, of this session of Congress, to the testimony of Hon. William Archer Cocke, a member of the late canvassing board, a member of the democratic party, and recently appointed to a judgeship in Florida by the new democratic governor of that State. See page 5.

Testimony of William Archer Cocke.

Question. As such attorney general, are you a member of the State canvassing board!

Question. As such attorney-general, are you a member of the State canvassing board?

Answer. I am.
Q. And you served in that capacity at the recent election?
A. I served in that capacity in relation to the late election.
Q. And also at any former election of 1574.
Q. Did the board of 1874, in canvassing the returns, go behind the returns in any sense to ascertain the true yote?
A. I believe they did, sir; but I am not absolutely certain. I think there was a contest in reference to the returns from Jefferson and Leon Counties, and the returns from each county came before the circuit court; and the difficulty was that it was thought that the county canvassers had not sent up true returns from some precincts; the circuit court directed the county canvassers from some precincts; in Jefferson, and in this county, to send up full copies of the returns; those copies came up, and the board acted upon those copies which it had gotten through the intervention of the court, the board not appearing by counsel or in any any, but by parties outside. My impression now is that the board in 1874 acted from these returns which had been sent to the board through the action of the circuit court of this circuit. turns which had been sent to the board through the action of the circuit court of this circuit.

Q. Did you at that time give an opinion as to the power of the board in the canvassing of the returns?

A. I did, sir.

Q. Did the board receive this opinion in 1874 and act upon it?

A. They acted upon it.

Q. Did the board this year proceed upon the same theory—upon your opinion?

A. Yes, sir; I think they did.

Q. Did the board receive this opinion in 1874 and act upon 187
A. They acted upon it.
Q. Did the board this year proceed upon the same theory—upon your opinion?
A. Yes, sir; I think they did.

We now call attention to section 4 of an act of the Legislature of Florida approved Angust 6, 1886, entitled "An act to amend an act to provide for the registration of electors and the holding of elections."

"SEC, 4. On the thirty-fifth day after the holding of any general or special election for any State officer, member of the Legislature, or Representative in Congress, or sooner if the returns shall have been received from the several counties where in elections shall have been held, the secretary of state, attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall meet at the office of the secretary of state, pursuant to notice to be given by the secretary of state, of the secretary of state, attorney-general, and the secretary of state, and proceed to canvass the returns of said election, and determine and declare who shall have been elected to any such office, or as such member, as shown by such returns. If any such returns shall be choven or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration, and the secretary of state shall preserve and file in his office all such returns, together with such other documents and papers as may have been received by him or by said board of canvassers. The said board shall make and sign a certificate, containing in words written at full length the whole number of votes given for each folice, the number of votes given for each folice, the number of votes given for each folice, the number of votes given for each folice and the secretary of state in a book to be kept for that purpose, and the secretar

IRREVERSIBLE DECISION OF THE CANVASSING BOARD.

This irreversible decision of the legal canvassing board of the State of Florida, which was required by the statute to find out and declare the result of the election, is to be found in authentic and conclusive form in its certificate of the result of the canvass made by a majority of the board in pursuance of the statute and duly recorded as required by the law in the office of the secretary of state.

A duly authenticated copy of this certificate, accompanying the certificate of the Hayes electors, was duly forwarded to and is now in the possession of the President of the Senate. That certificate is as follows:

Office of Secretary of State, Tallahassee, Florida, December 6, 1876.

Tallahassee, Florida, December 6, 1876.

We, the undersigned, Samuel B. McLin, secretary of state; Clayton A. Cowgill, comptroller, and William Archer Cocke, attorney-general of said State constituting a board of State canvassers in and for said State of Florida, do hereby certify that we met at the office of the secretary of state, at the capitol, in the city of Tallahassee, on the 27th day of November, A. D. 1876, and proceeded to canvass the returns of a general election held in the State aforesaid on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States.

We do certify, from the returns on file in the office of the secretary of state aforesaid, that the whole number of votes cast at said election for electors as aforesaid, was forty-four thousand six hundred and twenty-seven, (44,627,) of which—Frederick C. Humphries received twenty-three thousand eight hundred and forty-four (23,849) votes.

SAML. B McLin,
Secretary of State and ex officio Chairman of the Board State Canvassers.

C. A. COWGILL, Comptroller and ex officio member of Board of State Canvass

It is this decision of the board embodied in and evidenced by the foregoing certificate which the majority of the committee declare to be so "wholly illegal" and "absolutely void" that they would not even examine the evidence upon which the board acted, preferring undoubtedly that a committee of this House should itself can was and declare the result of the presidential election in Florida. Unfortunately for the majority, a committee of either House of Congress is not provided by the Florida statute as the method to be adopted for canvassing and declaring the result of a presidential vote of that State.

MISRBPRESENTATION AS TO THE SUPREME COURT'S DECISION.

MISRBPRESENTATION AS TO THE SUPREME COURT'S DECISION.

The attempt to impair the decision of the canvassing board by reference to the late decision of the supreme court in the case of George F. Drew vs. Governor Steams can have no effect, because founded upon a misrepresentation of the decision of the court. It is claimed by the majority that the court held that the board had no judicial powers whatever, and that having exercised such powers, its canvass was a "bald usurpation," to be utterly disregarded. This is an erroneous claim. The supreme court did not undertake to destroy or impair in the slightest degree the right of the board of canvassers given by the statute to receive evidence showing that a county return was so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the true vote could not be ascertained therefrom. But they did decide that when it was shown to the board that the return was so irregular, false, or fraudulent, the board must throw out the whole county return, and did not in the opinion of the court have judicial powers to purge the vote, rejecting that which was irregular, false, or fraudulent, but preserving so much of the return as certified the true vote and include the same in its determination and declaration.

This is the whole sum and substance of the decision of the court. It is true that on account of the condition of the pleadings and proofs at the time of the decision the court, for the purposes of the contest for governor, held that the returns from all the counties brought to their attention must be considered true and bonz fide returns; wherefore, according to their opinion, they must be counted. They did not determine, but expressly admitted the contrary, that if, as a matter of fact, upon the evidence shown the board, it should be their opinion that any returns were so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the true vote could not be ascertained, they might be rejected entirely, although they could not purge, and reject in part, and count in part.

Upon the misrepresentation of this decis ness and doubt, that a tribinal, revising, the express order of the court in the case chosen.

2. The canvassing board, acting under the express order of the court in the case of Drew against Stearns, made upon the pleadings in that case and canvassing according to the face of the returns but rejecting totally any return which they found to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the true vote could not be ascertained, reported in their return to the court upon the recanvass as follows:

"They return the following as the determination and declaration of the result of such recanvass, to wit: Of the candidates for governor, George F. Drew received 24,179 votes; Marcellus L. Stearns received 23,984 votes. And the undersigned make further return to the court, and say that though not ordered so to do by the court, for various reasons, they deemed best to make, while re-assembled as a board as aforesaid, a recanvass of the said returns of the said election on file in the office of the secretary of state, of and concerning the election of other officers voted for at said election, which will be found in the certificate of the result of such recanvass hereto appended as part of this return. And the undersigned further inform the court that we regard our former canvass of the returns of the election for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, on file in the office of the secretary of state, as conclusive. Yet, in view of the decision of the supreme court, we have re-examined the said returns and find that a recanvass of them according to the said decision would show that of the candidates for said electors Frederick C. Humphreys received 24,215 votes, Charles H. Pearce received 24,211 votes, Thomas W. Long received 24,004 votes, Wilkinson Call received 24,001 votes, Robert B. Hilton received 24,001 votes, Robert B. Hilton received 24,001 votes, Robert Bullock received 24,001 votes, Robert B. Hilton received 24,001 votes, Robert Bullock received 24,001 votes.

"(Signed)—Samuel B. McLin, secretary of state and chairman board of State canvassers; C. A. Cowgill, comptroller of public accounts."

The foregoing return utterly annihilates the pretense of the majority, that this decision of the supreme court of Florida had, if even in any event any decision of that court could have, any effect whatever upon the electoral vote; and, as before stated, the supreme court, in accepting the final return of the canvassing board, giving the same results as above as to the governor, expressly limit their opinion to the case and the pleadings and proof before them, and the court have never touched the electoral vote nor expressed any opinion as to what would be the effect of a recanvass of that vote upon the principles laid down by them.

THE SUPREME COURT'S OPINION ERRONEOUS.

THE SUPREME COURT'S OPINION ERRONEOUS.

Whatever justification there may have been for the decision of the court arising from the precise condition of the pleadings before them, it is respectfully submitted by the minority that, as a general proposition under the statute, the rule laid down by the court is erroneous and ought not to be regarded as correct law. Neither the court nor the majority of the committee can ignore the following plain language of the statute:

"I. If any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration.

"II. The secretary of state shall preserve and file in his office all such returns, together with such other documents and papers as may have been received by him or by said board of canvassers."

This statute of Florida, first passed in 1872, was a new statute, expressly enacted to prevent the embodiment in a declaration by a canvassing board of irregularity, falschood, or fraud at the polls. It is a wise and beneficial statute, intended to prevent candidates apparently elected through fraud or falschood from holding their offices even for a single moment under a prima facie certificate of election; it is therefore to be construed liberally, and in such a way as to most effectually and promptly carry out the objects for which it was enacted. The minority do not need to cite the numerous authorities on this point.

That a liberal construction of the statute allows the board to receive evidence of fraud and allows it to be shown to them, that falsehood existed in the election seems too plain for argument, and it has already been shown that such was the practice deliberately adopted at the instance of the democratic party, advised to be correct by the legal opinion of the democratic party, advised to be correct by the legal opinion of the democratic party, advised to be c

THE NEW DEMOCRATIC LEGISLATURE OF FLORIDA CANNOT BY STATUTE CHANGE THE RESULT OF A PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Having shown that it cannot be claimed that the supreme court of Florida either intended to or did change the electoral result, the minority call brief attention to the attempt made to impair the declared result of the presidential election by the present democratic Legislature. That Legislature was canvassed into office by the same board which canvassed and declared the presidential result. The board at the same time declared a recanvass of the vote for governor, and the board, in obedience to the mandate, declared the election of Drew for governor by about two hundred majority, but stated on the same principle (there being four hundred difference between the State and electoral tickets) that the Hayes electors by the same rule would have at least two hundred and eleven majority.

Governor Drew and the Legislature commenced their functions January 2, and immediately went to work by legislation to endeavor to change the presidential election. The Legislature passed an act requiring the new board of canvassers which had just been appointed by the governor to go to work and recanvass the presidential vote. The new board reported that they thought the Tilden electors were chosen, and the Legislature declared by another act that they thought so too; and that they had voted for Tilden. This whole proceeding, after the State of Florida had appointed its electors in accordance with its statute law, and those electors had voted and certified the result to the President of the Senate, is a mere farce, utterly unworthy of notice either by this committee or by Congress. It has been repeated the field that after the Legislature of a State has chosen a United States Senator the functions of the State are exhausted, and therefore the State could no more reverse or change its action than it can alter the Constitution of the United States.

THE QUO WARRANTO PROCEEDINGS BEFORE JUDGE WHITE ARE A NULLITY

THE QUO WARRANTO PROCEEDINGS BEFORE JUDGE WHITE ARE A NULLITY.

In further pursuance of the democratic policy, of overthrowing, either by chicanery or violence, the legally accomplished result of the presidential election, a proceeding upon information, in the nature of a quo varranto, was commenced by the four democratic candidates for electors before Judge White, of the local circuit court, having jurisdiction of certain subjects in Leon County, where Tallahassee is situated; and this judge has within the last few days assumed to render an adjudication that the republican electors were not chosen, and that the democratic electors were chosen; and the transcript of this decision, after an appeal to the supreme court of the State, is relied upon to upturn and reverse the recorded State action of Florida, which ended and ceased to be reviewable within the State on the 6th day of December, 1876.

It is not the purpose of the minority now to anticipate Congress in any discussion of the absurdity of this attempt, by the decision of a petty local judge, to change the result of a presidential election; and they content themselves with simply stating their belief that the fullest discussion will result in establishing the principle that when a State has exercised the political function of choosing presidential electors in such manner as the Legislature of the State has appointed, and the electors so chosen and declared elected by the proper tribunal, established by the election laws of the State for that purpose, have met upon the day fixed by Congress and duly cast their votes and certified the same to the President of the Senate, the power of the State over the subject is at an end. Neither by a recanvass, by a legislative statute, nor by a decision of its courts can this political State action, once deliberately and lawfully taken, be subsequently reversed.

LOCAL INVESTIGATIONS.

We now call attention to our views in regard to the investigations made by the committee in the different counties visited and inquired into. Manatee was not visited by the committee. One witness was examined in regard to the election in that county. He and the witnesses in regard to Monroe County were examined at Tallahassee. Baker and Clay Counties were inquired into in Duval County. Ala-

ALGERIA COUNT.

Arother Precinct No. 2, in this county, underwent an examination conducted by a subcommittee consisting of Thourse's, Horkins, and Denyaliz.

The regular-review of the property of the prop and more votes than Fleming's list contained, showing the comparative unreliability of that list. A considerable number of others, who were working at distant points, and were alleged to have voted, could have been obtained if the committee had remained to await their attendance.

"An analysis of the names of persons who swore before us that they voted the republican ticket at this poll shows, further, that 217 of these voters only are on Fleming's list; that 104 of the republican voters escaped his notice entirely; and the names he further confesses to have voted there cover the republican voters that the committee did not have time to call before them, readily making up their vote to the full claim of 399, and leaving no room for a claim of 130 democratic votes. That the poll-list had been badly tampered with is evident from the fact that 58 of those whom Fleming says voted are not on the poll-list, and 43 of those who swore they voted are on the poll-list but not on Fleming's list. Taking the tes imony together, in connection with Fleming's admissions, it appears that the republican majority was 280, even out of the 316 votes allowed to have been cast by the democrate. Where, then, did the democratic 136 votes come from? I tis apparent from all the circumstances that they were not cast—they were mostly fraudulent. In 1873 the democratic vote in Archer (where there was then but one poll) was 44 and in 1874 it was only 25. At the late election there was then but one poll was 44 and in 1874 it was only 25. At the late election there were two polls, and nearly all the whites voted at poll No. 1, where the democratic vote was returned as 98 and the republican as 54. This would show an increase of 399 democratic votes in the precinct in the last two years, which was impossible, as we shall show. The republican majority in 1874 in the whole precinct was 268; at the late election it was only 239. Their whole vote in 1874 was 233; at the late election at how. The republican proper in the shown of the precinct was sho

By Mr. Dunnell:
Question. While the poll-list of precinct No. 2 was in your possession, was it taken by you before the grand jury of this county?
Answer. It was.
Q. For what purpose?
A. For examination.
Q. Was or was not the election on the 7th of November, at Archer precinct, made the subject of investigation by the grand jury of this county?

A. It was.
Q. Did the grand jury make any presentment on that matter?
A. They did.
Q. Have you, as clerk of that county, a record of their presentment?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Please produce and read it.
Mr. DUNNELL. I ask that the records be read giving the findings of the grand jury.

The Chairman. I object to that. If there is any indictment found, I am ready that should appear. If there was no indictment found, I am also willing that that should appear, but any statement made by the grand jury, independent of not finding a bill, I certainly do not want to cumber the record with.

Mr. Dunnell. I don't want any statement. I want the presentment of the grand jury.

The Chairman. If there was any bill found I am ready to let it go in, but any other presentment I object to.

  - A. A presentment.
    Q. I now ask that you read from the records that presentment.

BAKER COUNTY.

There are three returns from Baker County, one of which is signed by the county judge, sheriff, and justice of the peace. Each of the others is signed by the county elerk and a justice of the peace.

The return signed by the judge, sheriff, and justice of the peace shows 189 votes for the democratic electors and 130 for the republican electors. The other two returns show for the democratic electors 381 votes and for the republican electors

The question arises which of these three returns is the legal one under the laws of the State of Florida governing the canvass of the precinct returns from the different counties.

ferent counties.

Section 24 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the registration of electors and the holding of elections" reads as follows: "On the sixth day after any election, or sconer, if the returns shall have been received, it shall be the duty of the county judge and clerk of the circuit court to meet at the office of said clerk and take to their assistance a justice of the peace of the county, (and, in case of the absence, sickness, or other disability of the county judge or clerk, the sheriff shall act in his place,) and shall publicly proceed to canvass the votes given for the several officers and persons as shown by the returns on file in the office of such clerk or judge."

judge."

Though it is doubtless the law that the majority of the board of county canvass ers may make a valid return, still it is clear from the provisions of the statute that no legal canvass of the precinct returns can be made unless there are three persons present, namely, the county judge, the clerk of the circuit court, and a justice of the peace, the sheriff acting instead of either of the two former in case of absence, sickness, or other disability.

It therefore follows that, if a canvass of the precinct returns be made by a less number of persons than is required by law, it cannot in any sense be a legal canvass, and the return based thereon is as worthless as the paper upon which it is written.

written.

The evidence of Martin L Cox, the clerk, and John Dorman, a justice of the peace, both democrats, shows that the county judge, on the 10th day of November, gave them notice in writing to meet him on the 13th of November at the clerk's office, at the county seat of Baker County, to canvass the returns from the different precincts. About one hour after the service of said notice, the clerk and justice of the peace convened at the clerk's office and canvassed the returns. Neither of them claims that the county judge was absent or in any way disabled from participating in the canvass on that day. They did ask, it is true, the sheriff to assist in the canvassing of the returns, who properly replied that he did not feel justified in so doing without conferring with the county judge, who would be in town that evening.

canvassing of the returns, who properly replied that he did not feel justified in so doing without conferring with the county judge, who would be in town that evening.

The county judge, being apprised of the premature and illegal action of the clerk and justice of the peace and construing such action as a refusal to convene with him to canvass the precinct returns of the county, met with the sheriff and a justice of the peace on the day stated in the written notice hereinbefore mentioned at the clerk's office and canvassed the said returns.

The return made out and signed by these three officers, being in all respects regular on its face, was adopted and declared by the State canvassing board when canvassing the election returns from the various counties of the State of Florida to be the only legal return from Baker County, as the minutes of the said board will show. But the members of that board, believing they had the legal right to exercise quasi-judicial powers as well as ministerial, a right which was never before questioned by the courts or citizens of that State, went behind this return and determined the vote of Baker County by counting the precinct returns. In so doing they counted the returns from two precincts which had been rejected by the county canvassing board composed of the judge, sheriff, and a justice of the peace, because of reliable information communicated to them of frauds and illegalities in the conduct of the election at the said precincts.

By virtue of the recent and extraordinary decision of the supreme court of the State of Florida, compelling by writ of mandamus the State canvassing board to recount the votes cast at the last election for the candidates for governor of that State as shown by the regular county returns, the said board had no other alternative than to count the vote of Baker County as shown by the returns signed by the judge, sheriff, and justice of the peace, it being the only legal return from that county.

The majority of the committee commenting in their report native than to count the vote of Baker County as shown by the returns signed by the judge, sheriff, and justice of the peace, it being the only legal return from that county.

The majority of the committee commenting in their report upon the validity of the certificate or return from Duval County, lay down the rule that no legal canvass can be made by less than three of the officers designated by law. Apply this rule to Baker County, and it is manifest that no legal canvass of the precinct returns was ever made by the clerk and the justice of the peace, Dorman, and, therefore, no legal return could be based thereon.

It is claimed by the majority, in support of the return signed by the clerk and justice of the peace, that their action was legal, because it is alleged in a paper accompanying their return, dated on Monday the 13th day of November, that the county judge and sheriff positively refused to participate with them in the canvass and that, in view of the fact that the time within which the said canvass should be made according to law would expire on the said Monday, they proceeded to canvass the vote. The evidence clearly shows that instead of making a canvass of the votes on the 13th, as shown by the precinct returns, they merely made a duplicate of the certificate or return they signed in such hot haste three days before. If it be claimed by the majority that the paper above referred to strengthens in the slightest degree the pretended return signed by the clerk and justice of the peace, the minority deem it proper to state that they never knew of the existence of the said paper until a few days ago. It was not introduced in evidence before the committee while in Florida, and had it been on file in the secretary of state's office it was the duty of that officer, in obedience to the subpona duces tecuns served upon him by order of the committee, to produce it with the return. When it was made or signed by Martin J. Coxe, the clerk and John Dorman, justice of the yearded in the office of the secretary of

MANATEE COUNTY.

The return from this county gives the democratic electors 262 votes and the republican electors 26 votes. The only witness from this county examined by the committee was Edgar H. Graham, a democrat, and county judge of Manatee. His testimony shows that the conduct of the election was characterized by a gross disregard of every essential requirement of law governing the holding of elections. The laws of Florida provide that a complete copy of the list of names of all persons duly registered as electors shall be furnished to the inspectors of election at each poll or place of voting in the county before the hour appointed for opening the election. According to the testimony of Graham, there were nine polling-places but there was no copy of the list of registered voters furnished to the election officers of any precinct. It is the duty of the county commissioners to appoint the inspectors of election for each poll, to designate the places for voting, and cause to be posted in conspicuous places in the vicinity of each polling-place three notices of such designation. The evidence shows there were no inspectors appointed in the manner required by law, but in the language of the witness were self-appointed. The county commissioners, regardless of their sworn duty, failed to designate any places for voting and to give any notice whatever of the time and place of holding elections go to the substance of the election and are to be construed as mandatory. Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations says the general rule upon this subject is: "Where by the express provision of the statute the election is to be held after proclamation or notice announcing the time or place, or both, and where no such proclamation has been made or notice given, the election is void." The only notice of the time and place of holding election was given at democratic mass-meetings in two precincts of the county. Graham says he notified some of the leading men of the county but does not pretend that a single republic MANATEE COUNTY.

The evidence further shows that at least two hundred electors staid away from the election for the reason, as Graham states, that there was no clerk, and nearly as many more could not get an opportunity to register.

By virtue of the decision of the supreme court of Florida the return from this county was counted for Drew for governor by the State canvassing board. It was rejected by the board, in canvassing the votes for presidential electors, upon strong proof that more than 50 per cent of the voters regarded the election as a mere farce. It is recklessly charged in the majority report that the then governor of Florida, who was a candidate for re-election, determined to defraud the people of that county of their votes by accepting the resignation of the clerk of the circuit court and failing to appoint his successor until a short time before the election. Is this true? To show that it is not we call attention to the testimony of Graham, introduced as a witness by themselves, a member of the democratic party and the judge of the county, on page 102 of the record, wherein he states that Mr. Green was appointed to fill the vacancy in the clerk's office on the 1st day of October, at least five weeks before the election; that he saw his bond and administered to him the oath of office. Where, then, is the evidence showing in the language of the report "a clear attempt to put obstacles in the way of the exercise of he right of suffrage by the voters of a whole county by the governor of a State in the interest of his party?" We assert that no such evidence was ever given before the committee and we respectfully challenge contradiction.

If the return from this county be valid it seems to us that legislative enactments made to secure the purity of elections and to give a just expression to the will of the people through the ballot-box should be regarded as wholly meaningless.

LEON COUNTY.

made to secure the purity or elections and to give a just expression to the will of the people through the ballot-box should be regarded as wholly meaningless.

LEON COUNTY.

Voting-precinct No. 13 in Leon County was the first to be examined by the committee. The evidence shows that there were appointed for this precinct by the county commissioners three inspectors, two republicans and one democrat. When the polls were opened, at precisely eight o'clock in the morning Amos Rouse, the democratic inspector, was not present. Joseph Bowes, one of the republican inspectors, testified before the committee (page 12) as follows:

"Question. What was done by yourself and others in the absence of Mr. Rouse for "Answer. When the time arrived for opening the polls I made proclamation that the time had arrived for opening the polls, and that as one of the inspectors appointed by the county commissioners had not appeared, it was the privilege of the electors present to elect another inspector. I asked them who they would choose. Archy Crowell nominated Isaac Dent, and Isaac Dent was unanimously chosen inspector."

Much unsuccessful effort was made by the majority of your committee to show that the polls were opened before eight o'clock. The evidence clearly establishes the fact that the election in this precinet was conducted in perfect compliance with the laws of the State and the regulations issued by the secretary of state. So fairly was the election managed that Amos Rouse, the democratic inspector who was soured in the morning because Isaac Dent was elected inspector foll line place, testified that he told Mr. Bowes just before the polls were closed that he had seen nothing wrong. (Page 43.)

Mr. Bowes also testified (page 13) as follows:

"Mr. Rouse said to me, in the presence of Mr. Richardson, that in the morning he felt a little dissatisfied; but since he had seen how things had gone he felt perfectly satisfied there was no attempt at fraud whatever, he never saw fairer election. He said so in the presence of Mr. Ri committee that they were used fraudulently, and hence the objection of the chairman.

Inasmuch as the majority of the committee objected to the above question, we deem ourselves justified in stating the notoriously declared purpose of the executive committee in issuing so small ballots. It was that the republican ticket could be known from its size by the colored voters of the county as so many of them could not read. Just before election the democratic committee surreptitiously got hold of one of these ballots for the purpose of sending out democratic tickets of the same size, hoping thereby to deceive the ignorant colored voters. When this was found out the republicans had a larger ballot printed with a red line across it. This was not done till some of the small tickets had been given out. Not all of them which had been given out for use in precinct No. 13 were recalled or supplanted by the larger ballots, and thus some of them were used by the voters in that precinct.

Amos Rouse testified that none of these small ballots were passed in by voters during the day, and in his examination by a "nod of assent" swore that he was watching all day though it appears in the testimony of Bowes that they were cast and that Rouse was not within sight of the ballot-box all day. Rouse also swore that he never heard of any surprise on the part of any one but himself when the small ballots were counted out; that he did not tell anybody about it till "after the returning beard canvassed the votes" or "about that time."

One Samuel J. Flemming swore in regard to voters in precinct No. 13 whom he knew and whom he did not know, and for the purpose of showing that there were too many votes thrown in that precinct, and on cross-examination swore, as will be seen on page 66, in regard to matters about which he knew nothing. It will also appear that he made his discovery about the time Amos Rouse made his, and that was when the canvassing board was in session.

He made an affidavit before Robert Gamble, who was secretary of the dem Question. What was it about? Answer. It was about that precinct election. Q. What was said in the afildavit about it?

A. About just what I have been talking to-night; more votes being polled there than there were men. That is the principal thing in it.

Q. Did it say anything about the opening of the polls?

A. Yes, sir; that was the principal thing. The opening of the polls; that is what I didn't like; for him to open the polls before they ought.

Q. Are you certain that in this adidavit you said anything about the number of votes being an excessive number?

A. I don't recollect.

Q. When was the first time you heard anything about an extra number of votes in that precinct?

A. It was some of the times coming to Tallahassee; I don't remember when.

Q. You did not hear about it in the region there?

A. No, sir.

Q. You heard about it first in Tallahassee?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you down here during the time of the excitement of the canvassing of the polls and votes in this State?

A. I don't know what time you call the excitement.

Q. The excitement preceding the promulgation of the vote. I mean after the election.

A. I don't know what time you call the excitement.

A. I came down to town frequently.
Q. You say that no one asked you to make an affidavit?
A. No; not that I remember particularly.

A. It might have been. Some one might have proposed for me to make an affidavit to certain facts as far as I knew. That proposition might have been made to me.

Q. How did you know personally about the opening of the polls in the Richardson school-house precinct?

A. By talking to Mr. Rouse and Mr. Roberts.

Q. Then what you knew was hearsay, was it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then what you made affidavit to matter that was merely hearsay with you. as to the opening of the polls?

A. No, I did not. I made the affidavit now, and I recollect what it was. It was about the time I met Mr. Rouse on the road, and how far he had to go, and how far I had to go, and what it was that passed between us.

Q. You knew nothing about the opening of the polls except by hearsay, did you?

A. No, sir; but I said when I saw Colonel Beard and the men who were to be challengers come back that something was wrong up there. I suspected something was wrong, and I went to inquire about it.

Q. Did you make an affidavit of that fact?

A. I think I did.

Q. Of your suspicion that something was wrong?

A. Yes, sir. It was my opinion that Rouse had plenty of time to be there to open the polls. I think I did say that.

Q. Where did the owners of these plantations which you have mentioned within the precinct vote, if you know?

A. No, sir; I don's know exactly. Some of them voted at No. 5, where I was, and some voted at Richardson's school-house; very few.

Q. It is very frequent that men pass from what is called one voting precinct into another to vote, is it not?

A. O. yes.

Q. What is popularly called the Richardson school-house people come out of one another to vote, is it not?

A. O, yes.
Q. What is popularly called the Richardson school-house people come out of one into another one to vote?

A. Yes; I did myself.
Q. And voters go into the Richardson district who do not live there?

A. Yes.

A. O. Any person has a right to vote in any precinct where he pleases?
A. O. yes.

A. 0, yes.

Such a witness is not just the one to upset the presidential election in a State.

We would further report in regard to this precinct that while the poll-list and registration-list agreed in the number of names on the one and checked upon the other, and that while the ballots in the box agreed with the votes reported, yet the evidence taken by the committee seemingly shows that a certain number of persons, who ap parently voted at No. 13, did in fact vote elsewhere in the country, and that some of these persons did not vote at No. 13. Some forty-five names were on the poll-list of No. 13, which were also found on other poll-lists in the county. But the examination was far from satisfactory. The examination which formed the basis of the conclusion that there had been fraudulent votes was conducted as follows, page 28:

A. Not that I know of.

The other twenty-two persons were examined in a manner very similar. A. Not that I know of.

The other twenty-two persons were examined in a manner very similar. Twenty-five men were brought before the committee who swore that they did not vote at No. I3, but voted elsewhere, although there may be twenty-five men in the county whose names are not on the county registration-list, and who bearing the names of these twenty-five men rightfully voted in No. 13; and although the committee did not attempt to identify these men, yet the majority of the committee came to the solemn conclusion from such an examination going only to these twenty-five men that the seventy-four small ballots were fraudulently cast. When we remember that the colored people are almost annually in very many instances changing their names, and when we consider, among other things, that these twenty-five men were all colored, we cannot come to any conclusion against the election in No. 13. We certainly cannot come to the conclusion that 75 fraudulent votes were cast, and norule of law would allow us to assume that a single fraudulent vote was cast beyond the 25 even if the evidence in regard to them shall be deemed reasonably conclusive. The vote in Leon County was not a large one, at least no more so than in the other counties of the State. There were 4,396 names on the county registration-list when sent out, and 150 names added on election day, making a total of 4,546. The number of votes cast was 4,038. For a presidential election, and in a State where the gubernatorial contest was especially exciting, and where there is so large a colored vote, we insist that the aggregate vote furnishes no evidence of fraudulent voting. We close our report on Leon County, denying that the evidence establishes the frands claimed by the majority. We deny that it conclusively shows any fraud. shows any fraud.

HAMILTON COUNTY

The subcommittee, consisting of Messrs, Thompson, Hopkins, and Dunnell, commenced the investigation of Jasper and White Springs precincts in Hamilton County, at Live Oak, on the 21st of December. These two precincts had been thrown on the ythe State board of canvassers and for the following reasons:

"Eighty-three democratic and 58 republican votes which had been illegally added to the electoral vote on the face of the return were thrown out. Jasper precinct No. 2, giving 321 votes for George F. Drew and 183 votes for M. L. Stearns for governor, 323 votes for the democratic electoral ticket and 185 for the republican electoral ticket, 330 votes for the democratic electoral ticket and 185 for the republican electoral ticket, 330 votes for Sess J. Finley and 184 votes for H. Bisbee, i., for Congress, 235 votes for N. J. Patterson and 257 votes for T. N. Bell for State senator, 167 votes for J. N. Greid, 295 votes for W. J. Duncan, and 29 votes for J. W. Gray for member of the assembly, was thrown out of the canvass on account of gross violation of the election law by the inspectors in not completing the canvass without adjournment, in allowing unauthorized persons to handle the ballots and assist in the count, in adjourning over night and going to another place, and in signing returns next day which they had not themselves made or verified, and the contents of which shey did not know. With these deductions the county was canvassed by unanimous vote."

E. Thomas Smith was the clerk in Jasper precinct, John E. Tuten, David Fryar, and George Smithson were the inspectors. The three officers first named were democratis and the last a republican. The evidence abundantly sustains the charges made before the canvassing board.

The adjournment before completing the canvass was not denied by any of the witnesses. The polls were closed at sundown, and they did not finish the countill four oclock in the morning, the hour of first adjournment. The clerk testified that they adjourned at four oclock in the morning till nine in candidate. The door was unlocked which separated the bed-room from the counter. The box remained there in the morning unguarded; many men coming in and going out.

The tally-sheet till the returns are made out is of absolute importance. It was left behind in the sheriff's office where the election was held—one witness says on the table, with no evidence that the door was locked; by another witness, that it was put into a trunk which he thinks was unlocked. The returns were made out during the forenoon of the 8th of November. There was the same outside interference. William H. Reynolds, the democratic lawyer, who had acted the night before contrary to law, in counting ballotsor reading off the names, and in keeping the tally-sheet, was present making out the returns. He filled out a part of the blanks in the returns. At this stage Henry J. Stewart, another democratic lawyer, enters to finish up the work. Stewart says he made out one return and he made it from "a copy, probably. It may have been made by Mr. Reynolds or somebody else." He could not say that the inspectors were present.

We cannot fail to report our full conviction that the State board acted in complete compliance with the law in throwing out this precinct.

The ballots, the sally-sheets, and the returns were almost entirely in the hands of outside party men. Every provision of the law regulating an election was disregarded. The letter, as well as the spirit of the law, was violated. We must call attention to one further fact: Mr. Stewart, who made out the returns, could not swear that the returns were read over to Fryar and Smithson when signed. It appears from the testimony of Smithson that he was told when he went home at four o'clock in the morning that he need not come back. He was so told by Fryar, one of the democratic inspectors. He was questioned about his conduct in the morning in connection with the returns, as follows:

Question. In the morning, who had the ballot-box?

Question. In the morning, who had the ballot-box? Answer. It was in a chair in Mr. Fryar's bar-room. Q. Mr. Fryar was there? A. Yes, sir; he was there when I got there; I didn't get there until about nine Octock.

Q. Then you went down to the room where you had had the vote the night before?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you got there what did you do?

A. I didn't do anything until they called me in the room to sign the return; I didn't do anything at all in the room.

Q. Where were you?

A. I was out there in the court-house yard.

Q. Who wrote the return?

A. I don't know that. Mr. Fryar and I were both out in the court-house yard for awhile, and he went in first, and came out there and told me that we had better go in. that they were ready for us; so we went in. He signed it, and then I did.

Q. Did you read the return yourself?

A. No, sir.

Q. Why didn't you read it to see whether or not it was right?

A. Well, nobody told me, and I didn't know anything about it. Nobody else read it. There were older ones than I was there.

In Jasper precinct we found a complete triumph of irregular proceedings. We

In Jasper precinct we found a complete triumph of irregular proceedings. We had there the reading of the names on the ballots, the counting of the votes, and the keeping of the tally-sheets almost wholly committed to active partisans. We had the abandonment of the tally-sheet, and before the returns are made out, to the open table of the sheriff's office. We had the wicked and inexcusable surrender of the ballot-box to the surroundings of a bar-room, within the reach of two men who were personally interested in the result of the election; and finally we had the returns made out by men unsworn, political intermeddlers, doing their work in the absence of the only republican officer of the election board. These returns were not read to Smithson, as he testifies. Ancram swears that when Blackwell read off the ballots he folded them and then handed them to Smithson, who put them into the box without reading them. The evidence shows clearly that Smithson was culpably negligent of his duties. He was no obstruction to the perpetration of fraud at a poll substantially taken possession of by men not sworn and wholly unauthorized to take any part in the business of the election. If the election at Jasper was a legal one, then a mob could run an election as well as a body of honest and duly qualified men. Reports of election cases in the House of Representatives could be adduced almost without number where polls have been thrown out with far less of intermeddling than in the case under consideration. At White Springs precinct the clerk and inspector of election omitted to insert in the return the votes cast for the democratic and republican presidential electors. On the 13th of November, six days after the election, when the board of county canvassers met to canvass the precinct returns, the omission was for the first time discovered. The clerk and inspectors being apprised of the mistake, made out and signed a new return, or what is termed in the evidence, a supplemental return of the votes cast for the electors. When this second return was made, there was no board of election officers for White Springs precinct in existence. When they completed the canvass of the votes and signed the return on the night of the election and transmitted the said return and other papers to the proper officers, the board was dissolved; their functions as officers of the election ceased, and therefore their subsequent acts in that character were null and void. If this view of the law be correct, as we certainly claim it to be, 83 votes must be deducted from the vote of the Tilden electors and 58 icon their subsequent acts in that character were null and void. If this view of the law be correct, as we certainly claim it to be, 83 votes must be deduced from the vote of the Tilden electors and 38 votes from the vote of the Hayes electors.

It is claimed by the majority that in precinct No. 1 of this county five votes must be declated from the vote cast for the Hayes electors and given to the Tilden electors, for the reason that on the day following the election the ballot-box was opened without authority and ten democratic ballots found therein; the return from that precinct showing that there were cast only five democratic tickets. Under no view of the evidence or the law applicable theretois this claim tenable. The testimony of the two republicant of the properties of the votes, after the close of the polls, they were present and saw every ballot counted and there were but five democratic the Sates super-visor, who testified that the election at this precinct was honestly and fairly conducted; that during the canvass of the votes, after the close of the polls, they were present and saw every ballot counted and there were but five democratic the votes. The tilectok were replaced in the box, which was returned, as required by law, to the clerk's office. The clerk's office mained exposed, even during the clerk's fire frequent absence. The morning after the election a new light dawned on the democratic supervisor. He suddenly came to the conclusion that a fraud had been prepertated upon the democratis who voted at this precinct, and demanded of the clerk a recount of the ballots. The clerk compiled ence, and found instead of five ten democratic tickets. To make the proof of fraud stronger, ten witnesses testified before the committee, in direct examination, that they voted the democratic ticket. The of them, a colored man in the employment of a democrata, admitted in cross-examination that he told his friends after the election of the contract of the place of voting and saw him hand it to the inspectors sai his name Botts either designedly or by mistake checked the name of Hernandez for Fernandez. If the list of Botts contained the name of a voter who did not give his middle name but which appeared on the registration-roll, it was contended they were different persons. The testimony of this witness in reference to illegal voting will compare favorably with all the others who were examined on the same subject and in relation to repeaters and non-residents. Were it true that this number of illegal votes was cast there is no competent evidence that they voted the republican ticket. Besides, it is clearly shown that the clerk of the circuit court, who is exostic registry agent, deputized one Beazly to register voters in the vicinity in which he lived. He qualified and entered upon the performance of his duties and registered not less than from fifty to sixty persons, four of whom testified before the committee that they were registered by Beazly and did vote. The evidence of the clerk shows that these names did not appear on what is known as 'the official registration-list which it was his duty to prepare. His excuse is that the Beazly list reached the printer at Jacksonville too late to be appended to the list already printed. Beazly's list was on file in Tallahassee and was inspected by Judge Cole, a respected citizen of Monticello, and others, who all agree as to the number of names thereon. If the persons registered by Beazley voted, as they could of right have done, and it is more than probable they did, there being a presidential and gubernatorial contest, this number must be deducted from the votes claimed to be illegal because of non-compliance with the registration laws, which disposes of the claim of the majority. The clerk, in failing to have the Beazly list printed, and to furnish a certified copy to the inspectors at each poll, committed a grave irregularity, but which in law does not vitiate or invalidate the certificate of the election.

The majority of the committee further demand that the votes of six they voted.

As to the repeaters, we admit that it is shown that twenty-nine persons appear as having voted twice, the same names appearing but once on the registration-list. There is no proof of identification of the illegal voter as the law requires, and it is not necessary the elector's name should appear on the registration-list neutral into vote. If he makes oath, on being challenged, that his name was once on the registration-list but has been improperly stricken therefrom, his vote must be received. There is no proof that there were no other persons of the same name in the county, nor as to what ticket they voted, and therefore no deduction should be made.

JACKSON COUNTY.

ceived. There is no proof that there were no other persons of the same name in the county, nor ast owhat ticket they voted, and therefore no deduction should be made.

JACKSON COUNTY.

The returns from Campbellton precinet in this county show there were 291 votes cast for the Tilden electors and 77 for the Hayes electors. The evidence shows that when the polls opened at eight o'clock in the morning of the election day there was assembled such a great number of white and colored voters that it was deemed expedient, and agreed to by the leading men of both political parties for the purpose of facilitating voting and preserving order, that the whites should vote during the first hour and the colored men the succeeding hour, and thus alternate until the closing of the polls. The colored men by the adoption of this plan occupied two hours of the forenoon in voting. The evidence of James Gaston shows that seventy six colored men and only about twelve or fifteen white men voted in the afternoon. It is clear that the whole white vote, with the exception of the number mentioned by Gaston, was polled before the adjournment a noon. The evidence of John McKinne, a lawyer and a native of Jackson County, who was a successful candidate on the democratic ticket for the Legislature, shows that he was familiar with the political complexion of the colored men living in the vicinity of Campbell-ton. He took an active part in furthering the success of his party on the day of election. He distributed democratic tickets among the colored men, yet he could not testify that more than fifteen of them voted the democratic ticket on the day of election, what became of all the votes of colored republicans cast during the two hours of the forenoon, the return showing only 77 republican votes, just one more than the number of colored votes polled in the afternoon They must have gone where the "woodbline twineth."

It is further shown that, during the adjournment of the board of inspectors at noon, the ballot-box was removed from the place of occupied by the officers of election by Stephens, who exhibited at the same time a large navy revolver. As soon as the polls closed the inspectors proceeded to canvass the votes, without first counting them to ascertain if the number of ballots corresponded with the number of names on the clerk's list. But four votes were counted, which Stephens put in his vest pocket, when in plain violation of law they adjourned and carried the ballot-box to the house of Mozely, two miles distant from the place of voting. They counted about forty votes in a private apartment, the door of which was closed against outsiders, when they again adjourned for about half an hour and went to supper in a different part of the house, leaving the ballot-box unguarded and unsealed, though a brother of Mozely and two other men were in a room but a short distance from that which contained the ballot-box. After supper they again met in the bed-room and counted the voters remaining in the box. Returns were made out and signed by the inspectors and clerk, and the ballot-box.

Sixty-three colored men, qualified voters, appeared before the committee and testined that they each voted the straight republican ticket at Friendship Church on the day of election. There was no attempt made to contradictor impeach the testimony of any of them. No democrat claimed that more than two colored men voted the democratic ticket at this precinct, one of whom, named Warren Law, made afficiant before a notarry public, prior to the arrival of the concressional committee, that he cast a republican ticket, which said affidavit is on file in the office of the secretary of state. The majority of the committee attempted to show that many of these colored witnesses might be mistaken as to the character of the ballot they swore they had voted, for the reason they could not read or write and were liable to be deceived by a bogus ticket having a flag above the name of Ratherford II. Hayes, as did the regular republican ticket, the democratic ticket having a nodevice, which

MONROE COUNTY.

Messrs. Thompson, Hopkins, and Dunnell on the 18th of December commenced an investigation into the conduct of the election officers of precinct No. 3. at Key West, Monroe County. The conduct of these officers and the action of the State canvassing board will be found stated in the following extract from the minutes of the board, made on the 5th of December:

"Monroe County, precinct No. 3. Key West, giving 401 votes to the democratic electoral and State tickets and 59 to the republican, was thrown out of the canvass on account of gross violation of the election laws by the inspectors, in adjourning before the completion of the canvass, and completing it the next day in a different place and without public notice. The vote on its rejection was unanimous, the attorney-general deciding, in reply to a question put to him as to the legal effect of these violations of the law, that it must be thrown out. With this deduction the county was canvassed." county was canvassed these violations of the law, that it must be thrown out. With this deduction the county was canvassed."

Before we analyze the testimony taken in this case we respectfully call attention to section 21 of the election laws of Florida:

"SEC.21. As soon as the polls of an election shall be finally closed the inspectors shall proceed to canvass the votes cast at such election, and the canvass shall be public and continued without an adjournment until completed. The votes shall be first counted, and if the number of ballots shall exceed the number of persons who shall have voted, as may appear by the clerk's list, the ballots shall be replaced in the box and one of the inspectors shall publicly draw out and destroy unopened so many of such ballots as shall be equal to such excess."

The provisions of this section so far as they relate to a completion of the canvass before adjournment have always been regarded as mandatory by every State canvassing board since the passage of the act in 1868. The democratic attorney-general, Hon. Wm. Archer Cocke, voted with the secretary of state and comptroller of accounts to throw out this precinct, and for the reasons above given. The following memorandum was furnished us by the clerk of the canvassing board:

"The following is a joint memorandum handed me as clerk of the State canvassing board by Hon. C. A. Cowgill and Hon. Wm. Archer Cocke, members of said board, on the 8th of December, 1876:

" December 8, 1876."

The protest of the honorable attorney general against throwing out this precinct followed only by a few hours his vote to throw it out. This change of position was a culmination with him of the democralizing influence of the democratic visit ors there in Tallahassee from the city and State of New York. The testimory taken in this case clearly shows that an adjournment took place before the canvass was completed; that the place at which the officers agreed to meet the second day was in another precinet, one witness calling at a public place and another a private place; that the votes were counted over three or four times the second day; that errors were found the second day; that the returns were made out from a corrected tally-sheet made the second day; that none of the voters of precinct No. 3 was present on the second day to witness the action of the officers, and that there is a disagreement as to the partial announcement of the vote the first day and before adjournment. The ballot-box, poll-list, and registration list were taken away from the view of the voters before the officers had completed their duties. The purity of the election which this section of the law was intended to secure was not preserved. This section does not permit an adjournment. The testimony of Dr. Harris may well be disregarded, for his own election to the State Legislature depended upon the vote of this precinct, and for the further reason that his testimony is in conflict with an affidavit which he made before the State canvassing board. Witness Kemp does not fully sustain the two Bartlums; Reyes emphalically contradicts them. The democratic officers took possession of the ballot-box, and Reyes, the only republican edicer, was wholly ignored. We therefore are compelled to sustain the action of the canvassing board in rejecting this precinct. The action of the board had the approval of the attorney-general, and is fully in keeping with the action of every State canvassing board in rejecting this precinct.

CLAY COUNTY.

The majority say that the Clay County return was not irregular or false on its face, and therefore should not have been rejected by the canvassing board in its recanvass of the governor vote under the order of the court to throw out the whole return if so irregular or false that the true vote could not be ascertained.

In reply, we simply ask the majority to tell us the true vote of the county from the following accurate summary statement relating to the fraudulent vote from the face of the Clay County return:

Green Cove Springs: For Samuel J. Tilden for President Tilden, 74 votes; for Thomas A. Hendricks for Vice-President, 74 votes, for President Tilden, 74 votes; for Vice-President, 74 votes; for Presidential electors: republican electors, (naming them.) 122 votes; democratic electors, (naming them.) 287 votes; democratic electors, (naming them.) 6 votes;

DUVAL COUNTY.

DUVAL COUNTY.

The validity of the return from this county, to the surprise of the minority, is questioned by the majority for the alleged reason that the board of county canvassers was composed of two instead of three persons. How they came to such a conclusion is a matter of the wildest conjecture, considering the testimony discloses no proof of the fact and every presumption of law is in favor of the legality of the acts of officers of election boards. Probably this conclusion is the offspring of extreme anxiety to find an offset to the Baker County return, based upon an illegal canvass made by two persons, as is clearly shown by the testimony. The return from this county, it is true, is only signed by the clerk and a justice of the peace, and accompanying it is a certificate showing the refusal of the judge to sign it. If there were no such certificate, the law is plain that a majority of a canvassing board may sign a return, the return being no part of the canvass and affording no presumption that the legal number of persons did not participate in the canvass.

The majority of the committee have seen fit to animadvertin bitter terms upon the conduct of republican officials because sixteen men confined in a jail voted in this county, some of whom were awaiting trial, three being convicted of felonies but not sentened. There is no pretense made that they were not qualified voters, but an intimation is unjustlymade that they voted the republican itcketunder duress, without a scintilla of evidence to support it. We do not deem it our duty, under the resolution creating and defining the duties of the committee, to cast reflections on the conduct of democratic officials without clear proof, but we feel constrained to say that the reports of investigating committees should be regarded by the contrive as a solution of the conduct of the contribute of the conduct of t

Alleged disability of Elector Humphries.

January 31, 1877, the majority took the testimony of James E. Yonge, who had been candidate for elector, to the effect that Frederick C. Humphries, one of the electors, had been a United States commissioner, and they also had annexed to their report a copy of Mr. Humphries's appointment. But Mr. Humphries resigned the office before November 7, 1876, and his resignation was duly accepted, and he was not such commissioner either November 7, 1876, when he was elected, or December 6, 1876, when he voted as elector, as appears by his sworn testimony before the State canvassing board of Florida, as follows:

Examined by the CHARMAN:

Question. Are you shipping commissioner for the port of Pensacola?

Answer. I am not.

Q. Were you at one time?

A. I was.

Q. At what time?

A. Previous to the 7th of November.

Q. What time did you resign?

A. The acceptance of my resignation was received by me from Judge Woods about a week or ten days before the day of election, which I have on file in my office. I did not think of its being questioned, or I would have had is here. He stated in his letter to me that the collector of customs would perform the duties of the office, and the collector of customs since done so.

SUMMARY OF METHODS OF ESTIMATING FLORIDA'S VOTE

As a summary of the various ways of estimating the vote of the State of Florida on the 7th of November, the minority submit the following:

I. If the vote be reckoned by the face of the returns which were opened by the board on the 28th of November, and unanimously declared, (Attorney-General Cocke concurring), under the rule of the board, to be the regular returns, having all the legal formalities complied with, the majority for the Hayes electors is 43.

II. If the vote be reckoned by the official statutory declaration of the canvassing board exercising its jurisdiction under the State statute, in accordance with the practice adopted without objection, and by the advice of the democratic attorney-general, Cocke, and never disputed until the result of this canvass was about to be determined, which declaration in the belief of the minority is final and irreversible, the majority for the Hayes electors is 925.

III. If the vote be reckoned upon the principles laid down by the supreme court in their order to recanvass in the case of Drew vs. Governor Stearns, of not purging the polls of illegal votes and retaining the true vote, but of rejecting the whole county return when appearing or shown to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the true vote could not be ascertained, the result would be, according to the declaration of the board, a majority for the Hayes electors of 21t.
